This volume emerges from three collaborative prjects developed in the Newton, Massachusetts public schools. The Career Information Project attempted to develop improved procedures for acquiring, processing, and disseminating career information. The Follow-Up Program designed and implemented as system for conducting comprehensive follow-up studies of Newton students. A third project developed a job placement service for Newton secondary-school students. Because of the strong interrelationships of these three projects, in 1967-1968, they were coordinated in a single Career Resource Center. This document provides theoretical background for the services, describes briefly the projects as developed in Newton, and presents guidelines for the development of similar services in other school systems. A major bibliographic index of materials assembled and used in the Career Resource Center is also included. (Author)

Foreword

Three of the weakest elements in vocational guidance programs have been: (1) the absence of systematic and thorough follow-up studies of drop-outs and graduates, (2) the weakness of the occupational information material available, and (3) the weakness of job placement programs - especially as they are related to vocational planning and decision-making. One of the major reasons for this condition is that it is expensive to mount adequate programs in these three areas.

I had long wanted to improve these programs in Newton and a happy combination of circumstances made it possible to do so. This combination consisted of the availability of funds from a variety of sources (including the Ford Foundation, the Federal government, and the Massachusetts Bureau of Vocational Education) and the availability of three doctoral students from Harvard University who chose to do their doctoral projects in Newton while working as internes in the administration of pupil personnel services in the Newton Public Schools.

My chief interest was in the improvement of the Newton program, but it was recognized, also, that we had an obligation to develop models which would have some general usefulness. It is not expected that all school systems will be able to adopt the three models in their entirety. We do hope, however, that they will be useful in suggesting ways of introducing and managing less elaborate programs which may be more feasible in financial terms.

Shortly after we started the Career Information Library and the Follow-Up Study, Professor David Tiedeman of Harvard was able to get a large grant from the U.S.O.E. to undertake a research and development project on the use of the computor in facilitating the vocational counseling process. This project known as Information System for Vocational Decisions (ISVD) is being jointly sponsored by Harvard University, the Newton Public Schools and the New England Educational Data System (NEEDS). The three projects in Newton already started related naturally to the ISVD project and in some matters the Newton projects and the ISVD project became identical. We are grateful for the material and intellectual help received from ISVD.

The three young men (Circle, Clemens, and Kroll) initiated, organized, and managed these programs. The descriptions indicate the thoroughness of their work, but do not tell of the skill and care in human relations which were involved. It is not easy to introduce new programs so that they are accepted on their merits; none of these programs were forced on anyone. The project directors had to obtain consent from the people involved in order to move ahead with their programs. To them must go the credit for the success of the programs.

Preface

A primary goal of education in a democratic society is the maximum development of individual potential. Among the many ways in which public schools are pursuing that goal are through programs of guidance which provide opportunities for young people to come to know themselves and their potentials, to explore ways of implementing themselves in the world of work, and to develop educational plans for achieving tentative career goals.

Decisions in the process of career development are among the most important decisions youth must make. Yet our society frequently imposes choice-points in the lives of youth without providing adequate information about or means of understanding the implications of such choices for human development. Particularly crucial decisions include those surrounding curriculum choice in early adolescence, especially the decision to enter or bypass vocational education.

Career decisions can only be as adequate as the information about self and the occupational world on which they are based. Pope once wrote, "What can we reason but from what we know?" Comprehensive school guidance programs are having increased demands made upon them to assist young people in understanding themselves and in making adequate and satisfying decisions regarding opportunities in education and work. A major obstacle for school guidance programs is the complexity of keeping abreast of the changing occupational world and of providing meaningful exploratory vocational experiences.

The project of which this report is a part was undertaken in the Newton, Massachusetts, Public Schools. The primary goal was the development of a comprehensive career information service to students and professional staff. Immediate goals involved the establishment of an effective career information library developed by Arthur M. Kroll, a follow-up program for collecting information from former students developed by David B. Clemens, and a viable placement program enabling students to enter appropriate occupational roles developed by Duncan F. Circle - all to be integrated into a unified, comprehensive career information service. The final result of the integration of these three services was the creation of the Career Guidance Resource Center at Newton High School under the direction of Dorothea Overholt who had formerly been project assistant in the development of the career information library. Eleanor Wasserman joined the project for one semester to help in implementing the guidance services provided by the center. Ann Caggiano became secretary at the center.

The career information service was undertaken through the encouragement of Dr. Edward Landy, Assistant Superintendent for Pupil Personnel Services and Special Education, and Mr. Wallace J. Fletcher, Consultant in Technical, Vocational and Adult Education, both of the Newton Public Schools. The Technical-Vocational Development Program, Dr. J. Bernard Everett, chairman, supported the project in its inception and planning phase under a Ford Foundation grant to Newton. Subsequently, the project received its major funding (January, 1966 - June, 1968) under Public Law 88-210 from the Bureau of Vocational Education of the Department of Education in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Special recognition is made of Mr. Walter J. Markham, Director of the Bureau of Vocational Education for his continued interest and enthusiasm for the project and whose support made it possible. The authors are also grateful for the services of both Mr. John P. Morine and Mr. Lot H. Cooke, Jr., Senior Supervisors of the Bureau of Vocational Education, and Mr. Daniel H. Malia, department head of industrial arts, Newton Public Schools, and the many other persons in the Newton Public Schools who have aided in the development of this project.

The authors are indebted to the part-time secretaries, who have helped with the often tedious details of developing and operating the projects and producing this document. At various times these have included: Nellie Rae Burman, Mary Cowan, Barbara Foley, Irene Hahn, Marjorie Kinchla, Doris Lacey, Janet Margolin, Bodie Miller, Mary O'Doherty, and Celia Trumble.

Alice Sizer Warner has provided invaluable editorial assistance in coordinating the differing ideas and styles of the four authors. The Data Processing Center of the Newton Public Schools, Dr. Joel Berg, director, has been of continuing assistance as the library was being accumulated. Edward Donhowe of the center was responsible for programming the presentation in Appendix A.

Printing of the document was done by the students of the graphic arts department of Weymouth Vocational Technical High School under the instruction of Mr. Dunn and Mr. Knott. They were assisted by the students of the graphic arts department of the Blue Hills Regional Technical High School at Canton, Mr. Coughlan, instructor. The cover design was by Joanne Tibnam, a student in the advertising art department of the Blue Hills Regional Technical School, Mr. Desjardins, instructor.

Changing Perceptions of Guidance Functions 7

Background and Purpose of This Volume

This volume is the documentation of one school system's effort to provide career information and career guidance to its own pupils. The discussion is intended to be illustrative rather than prescriptive of a single approach; school systems even in the same general geographic area are unique entities with unique problems and pupils and personnel -- and no two school systems can possibly organize themselves entirely alike. This volume is a case study, then, not a "cookbook" to be followed exactly. But it is hoped that this documentation may become useful to school systems who are attempting to create a career information service of their own.

The school system discussed here is that of Newton, Massachusetts, a prosperous Boston suburb of some 100,000 residents. Roughly equally divided among Protestants, Jews and Catholics, the population is virtually entirely white, well-educated, and profitably employed. While the town is primarily residential, there is a small industrial area, some wholesalers, and a normal complement of retailers. Newton (originally New Towne at its founding in 1630) in the late 1960's finds itself almost completely developed with its population levelling off.

Newton prides itself on having an exemplary "lighthouse" school system, called by Time magazine,"... the most creative school system in the U.S. today - - an 'island of change'." (1) Just under 20,000 students are currently being educated in Newton's 23 elementary schools, five junior highs, two high schools, and one junior college. Over the years, Newton schools have benefitted from a constructive relationship with the various research-oriented universities in the Boston area.

This volume emerges from three collaborative projects developed in the Newton Public Schools. Two of these projects, the Career Information Project and the Follow-Up Program, received pilot support from the Newton Public Schools, from a Ford Foundation grant for the Technical-Vocational Development Program in Newton, and from the Committee on Pupil Personnel Services (COPPS) of the Harvard Graduate School of Education. These two projects, since January, 1966, received major funding from the Bureau of Vocational Education of the Department of Education of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts under Public Law 88-210. In essence, the Career Information Project attempted to develop improved procedures for acquiring, processing, and disseminating career information. The Follow-Up Program designed and implemented a system for conducting comprehensive follow-up studies of Newton students. In 1967, a third project, developed with funding from the Information System for Vocational Decisions (a joint research project of the Harvard Graduate School of Education, the New England Education Data Systems, and the Newton Public Schools) and from the Technical-Vocational Development Program grant in Newton, developed a job placement service for Newton secondary school students. Because of the strong interrelationships of these three projects, in 1967-1968 the three activities were coordinated in a single Career Resource Center.

This document is written by four different people who worked on different phases of these projects in Newton. It provides theoretical background for the services, describes briefly the projects as developed in Newton, and presents guidelines for development of similar services in other school systems. Also included is a major bibliographic index of materials assembled and used in the career resource center.

Essential Foundations for a Career Resource Service

The making of choices, decisions, and life plans is one of man's most distinctly human attributes. Since man does not possess an inherent repertory of responses to the world in which he lives, his behavior and actions depend primarily on cognitive learning. The adequacy of such learning is directly related to the information to which the learner has access. People may be considered as continuous, long-term receivers of information derived from every aspect of life. Each new experience provides fresh "input," as it were, for the human information processing system.

The schools provide a special orbit of information provision, especially pertaining to the development of an increasingly differentiated perception of self and world, and with mastery of cognitive skills essential for dealing with such information. Within the schools, the instructional function involves primarily the directing of a pupil's attention on subject matter outside of himself. The guidance function focuses the pupil's attention upon himself as a self-actualizing being and tries to foster the pupil's attainment of maximum personality development. Consequently, within these complementary functions, the teacher's point of reference lies in the experience of others, whereas the guidance worker's point of reference lies in the experience of the pupil. The teacher seeks to communicate the experience of others as it relates to the pupil. Guidance involves the pupil's examination and analysis of his own experience as it relates to the experience of others. In other words, guidance seeks to foster a differentiated perception of one's own experiences within a context of the experiences of others. Included in such a general goal for guidance is making accessible to students information for self-evaluation with reference to educational and vocational opportunities.

Decisions made in the process of career development are based largely on available information about opportunities at work. The adequacy of a career decision may thus be assumed to be in a direct relationship to the accessibility and quality of available occupational information. Since persistent changes in technology and society are rapidly modifying career opportunities, career planning is becoming an increasingly complex process for students contemplating entry into the working world. It has been said that 25 percent of today's workers are employed in occupations that were non-existent twenty-five years ago. Furthermore, estimates have been made that, in the not-too-distant future, 75 percent of the working population will be in occupations that do not now exist. Over 40,000 specified job titles are listed in the 1965 Dictionary of Occupational Titles. Not only are the careers from which students may choose growing in multiplicity, but the matter is complicated by the fact that many career opportunities are characterized by low visibility. Often the nature of an occupation and its influences upon one's life style are known only to those persons already engaged in it. Consequently, students, if unaided, can hardly be expected to acquire an accurate understanding of the complexities of occupational life.

> In former times, when occupational life was less highly specialized, parents assumed a responsibility for informing their children about careers. Most parents today, however, find themselves severely limited in vision of the breadth and variety of opportunities possible for their children. Lack of understanding by parents toward this aspect of the child's education has led to a growing demand for greater responsibility on the part of the school to assist young people in their vocational development. (2)

It has been demonstrated that a person's knowledge of himself and of the occupational world sets limits on the range of alternatives which enter his career decision-making. As an example, a person's ability to differentiate between occupations, both at the major occupational class level and at the specific occupation within class level, affects the accuracy of his choice-making. Holland (3) uses the illustration of a person who can think only of laboring jobs versus clerical jobs making a crude choice with a relatively low probability of adequacy. Conversely the individual who can distinguish types of clerical and laboring jobs increases the probability of making an adequate decision.

(2) W. Wesley Tennyson, et al., The Teacher's Role in Career Development, 1965 edition, Washington, D.C., National Vocational Guidance Association, 1965, p. 9.

Vroom has expressed this factor of information limiting choice as follows:

> Clearly a person's choice among occupations is limited to those about which he knows something. If a person has no concept of what an ichthyologist or an epidemiologist is or does, it can have no effect on his vocational decisions. For most people the range of possible alternatives from which to choose is greatly limited by the restricted range of information which they have concerning the world of work. Furthermore, the conceptions which people have of the activities performed by and rewards accruing to members of occupations are seldom based on actual experience and may be greatly at variance with reality. Rosenberg (1957) has compared the person making an occupational choice to a hungry child with a coin looking at a long counter of sweets which he has never tasted, who must decide on one purchase. (4)

In reality, the situation is extended even further. The youngster must make choices without ever having seen some of the "sweets." However, he also is not prevented from rejecting his first choice and reselecting, as frequently happens. Any individual, when faced with alternatives for choosing, naturally is limited to those which he has perceived. Alternatives which have not entered experience are, in fact, not alternatives at all. Adequate career decisions can be made only when information about occupational alternatives, the changing nature of work conditions, educational requirements, procedures for job entry, and the like is easily accessible. Pope once wrote, "What can we reason but from what we know?" Therefore, the writers contend that the provision of information for self-evaluation with respect to career opportunities cannot be left to chance, but should be an ongoing guidance service within the school structure.

Changing Perceptions of Guidance Functions

As any profession moves on to fresh emphases, there is a tendency to lose sight of or to denigrate the significance of its predecessors. Similarly, as guidance has moved forward from a rather narrow framework of providing vocational guidance services to more comprehensive programs designed to meet a variety of student needs, the importance of the career development process as one facet of a total guidance program seemingly has decreased over the past two decades. Only in the past few years has there emerged a resurgence of interest in career concerns. It may be important, however, to review the possible reasons why guidance for career development has been awarded a lowered priority.

Guidance in the secondary schools seems to focus on two major functions--educational planning and the promotion of mental health -- neither of which are considered within the context of career development. Our society, with its major emphasis on college preparation, places certain demands and expectations upon the schools. Among these expectations is the valid assumption that the guidance program should help students face the discontinuities encountered in college selection and entrance. Guidance at the high school level especially reflects this pressure in its preoccupation with course selection and college planning. The writers contend that such concerns are legitimate tasks for guidance, but that their value is diminished appreciably when removed from the context of the career development process. Too frequently educational planning has been regarded as synonymous with career planning. Yet they are not interchangeable, for education is but one of several important considerations in a youth's development of a purposeful and meaningful career.

Within a context of educational planning largely divorced from career considerations, the non-college preparatory youngster becomes disadvantaged. Educational planning loses its meaning for him when it is detached from work. Community attitudes and values also contribute to widening the artificial distinctions between education and work. These attitudes are typically reflected in a community's lesser regard for technical - vocational (as opposed to "academic") education, and concurrently, for the students enrolled in such programs. The writers suggest that greater balance could be achieved for all students if guidance operated within the larger context of career development, rather than within a structure of educational planning for its own sake.

To be sure, such criticisms are broad generalizations and do not reflect a totally accurate picture of secondary school guidance in the United States. A strong counter-argument frequently raised by guidance practitioners is that they now attempt to deal with "whole" students and not with separate aspects of their persons. Career concerns thus assume an appropriate position within the total personality gestalt. Yet if one were to look for empirical evidence within schools of concern for occupations, one would usually find a preponderance of time, effort, and resources devoted to educational rather than vocational or career planning. One need only look at school libraries to note the differential in space accorded to college catalogs and reference materials as opposed to occupational information and planning materials.

A second major emphasis in school guidance programs in the United States is the promotion of mental health. Efforts to date have centered for the most part on "secondary" prevention, the identification and treatment of those students who manifest emotional problems or some other disturbance in their personality development and functioning. More recently, guidance personnel have been intrigued by the concept of "primary" prevention, the development of skills and strengths that will enable youngsters to meet and to cope naturally with the difficulties and discontinuities experienced in growing up. Among these "strengths" is usually included the development of a healthy, realistic self-concept. A variety of methods for fostering self-understanding have been introduced to education. It is the writers' contention that the student best learns to understand himself in relation to something, in this instance education and careers. While studying career development problems, the student hypothetically relates himself to opportunities at work and makes judgments and asks questions about himself. Thus, a major mental health goal might also best be accomplished in a context of career development. Before proceeding to an extended discussion of the purpose of this document, it may be important to survey a report by Wrenn of reasons for the low value placed upon vocational guidance in recent years.

C. Gilbert Wrenn, in reviewing a Project TALENT study of what school counselors do, (5) reports that counselors in a 5 percent random sample of all United States public schools ranked vocational counseling in seventh place in high schools and in fifth place in junior high schools, below such duties as counseling for college, high school program planning, counseling for "developing potential," and counseling for "inadequate achievement." Testing and teaching were the two additional tasks given higher priority than guidance for careers by high school guidance workers. The causes of the current deemphasis of career guidance is complex, although we can identify some of the

(5) C. Gilbert Wrenn, The Counselor in a Changing World, Washington, D.C., American Personnel and Guidance Association, 1962, p. 115.

contributing reasons. (6)

In the first place, career guidance has become more complex and consequently more difficult for counselors to master. Occupational demands are changing rapidly, and new or modified occupations are constantly being added to the scene, making documented occupational information quickly out of date. For example, the 1965 revision of the Dictionary of Occupational Titles contains 6,000 job titles not listed in the 1949 edition. Educational requirements for job entry are increasing, and it may be difficult to distinguish the various levels involved in an occupational field. Post-high school educational opportunities are becoming increasingly varied, imposing greater pressure on counselors if they are to be aware of the alternatives. An increased proportion of students aspiring to some form of higher education places greater demands on the counselor's time. In fact, the rapid pace of change in the environment perhaps makes it easier for guidance personnel to focus on proximate, school-oriented decisions than on the more distant, work-related decisions. Yet avoidance of the future cheats students, since today's educational choices form the bases of tomorrow's occupational decisions.

An increased awareness by guidance workers of the complex nature and multiple determinants of career development perhaps has been discouraging and not conducive to further development or practice in this area. It is no longer adequate to test abilities, aptitudes, interests, and achievement and to relate them to perceived job requirements. Guidance workers increasingly recognize the roles of attitudes, motivation, social pressures, and self-concept in career development. Such factors are less readily assessed.

(6) We are indebted to C. Gilbert Wrenn for many of the ideas presented in this subsection. His article, "What has Happened to Vocational Counseling in Our Schools, "(The School Counselor, Vol. 10, No. 3, March, 1963, pp. 101-107) should be consulted for a full review of factors contributing to the lessening emphasis on vocational counseling.

Accompanying his increased acceptance on the educational scene, the guidance worker has new and urgent demands made upon him by school personnel. Some of these demands have been unrealistic. He is expected to be a miracle worker for underachievers, a trouble shooter in discipline problems, and a general panacea for the varied problems of pupils. In some cases, demands have been too heavy, and the counselor is expected to play too many roles. He has less and less freedom to operate and to determine the roles he thinks he should play. Although the guidance worker has played some of the roles expected of him rather poorly, he faces increased difficulty in delimiting those sectors in which he may be effective and successful.

A more subtle influence decreasing the practice of career guidance in the public schools is the assumption by some counselors that most "worth-while" students will attend college, thus enabling a postponement of their vocational decisions. Recipients of subtle social discrimination and second-rate help in career planning are those students entering an occupation upon high school graduation or leaving prior to graduation. Frequently overlooked is the fact that education is but one aspect or phase of career development and that most students, regardless of educational aspiration and attainment, will some day enter the world of work.

Perhaps the most significant--though difficult to identify--influence is a form of vocational snobbery on the part of guidance workers searching for status and professionalization.

> It is a sad truth that dealing with emotions and doing 'personal adjustment' counseling is considered by some to be higher on the totem pole than 'vocational counseling.' Nothing could be further from the truth........ (7)

Such a hierarchy is fallacious for several reasons. First, students are striving to develop goals and purposes in life; career planning is vital to the development of such goals. Secondly, career development is probably as affect-laden as any counseling problem (excepting counseling with severely disturbed persons). Dichotomizing "personal" and "educational" guidance from career guidance is artificial because all are interrelated aspects of the development of the whole person.

Counselor education programs have also contributed to the decline in priority of career guidance. Many counseling courses emphasize "psychotherapeutic" techniques rather than the dynamics of counseling for decision-making or other rationally—oriented approaches. A greater proportion of time is spent on personality theory and methods for identifying, assessing, and treating personality disturbances than on career development theory and the uses of occupational information. Many training programs fail to equip counselors adequately enough to deal with "normal" youngsters--the major portion of those attending the schools. Guidance students who identify with their training tend to place priority rankings on their activities in practice that closely resemble the priorities evidenced in their training.

Perhaps all of these influences to some degree have contributed to a lessened emphasis on career guidance, but the writers believe that one additional factor--the accessibility of occupational information--is perhaps a most crucial factor. Most counselors cannot find the time to acquire, evaluate, classify, file, retrieve, and disseminate information about occupations. Since career guidance consists primarily of rational decision-making experiences based on information about self and the world of work, any limitations in the accessibility of reliable, adequate information preclude attempts to develop guidance for career development.

OVERVIEW OF THE NEWTON CAREER INFORMATION PROJECT

This initial section describes the establishment and management of the career information library in the Newton, Massachusetts, Public Schools, presenting a brief illustrated overview of the organization of the resource center and delineating the tasks that comprise its operation and administration. As such, this section should be regarded only as one example of a library resource and should be used only as a general guide which points up the considerations which of necessity are part of the functioning of an information service. Thus the contents of this section should be regarded as open-ended. New functions and responsibilities could be added as needed.

The second part of Section II presents more specific guidelines for development of a career information library.

Purposes

The career information library in the Newton Public Schools was designed to serve as a clearing-house for career information available through a variety of media. The major underlying assumption was that the tasks of acquiring, classifying, evaluating, storing, and disseminating occupational information had become sufficiently complex so as to preclude their being carried out effectively by individual school counselors as part of their on-the-job activities. Initially, a central resource center served as a model for the development of satellite school-based libraries, and where school personnel could preview and evaluate materials for possible purchase for their school libraries. Among the specific functions of this central career information library were the following:

(1) To acquire, classify, and file single copies of all types of available career literature.

(2) To disseminate free and inexpensive career literature to school libraries, student lounges and common rooms, school guidance counselors, and other appropriate potential users of occupational information.

(3) To inform librarians and counselors of good, commercially available career materials as they are placed on the market.

(4) To make certain collections of career materials available to school libraries on a revolving loan basis.

(5) To make available to schools filmstrips, slide/record programs, tape recordings, films, and related materials pertaining to careers.

(6) To keep abreast through continuous research activity of new developments in career information in the various media.

The project personnel also intended actively to encourage the establishment of career resource centers in the libraries of Newton's five junior high schools, two high schools, one technical high school and one junior college. The model resource center would develop systematic procedures for acquiring, processing, and distributing all types of occupational information. An attempt was to be made to utilize electronic data processing equipment for such applications as compiling bibliographic references, sorting, updating, and manipulating references. Complementing the development of one major and several satellite occupational resource centers was the intention to encourage staff and student utilization of career information. Complete description of these later endeavors is contained in Section V, Using The Career Guidance Resource Center.

Organization for Acquisition of Materials

Intrinsic to both the establishment and the maintenance of a career information center is the process of acquisition of career information materials. Because the Newton project began with few materials on hand, a major acquisitions program had to be undertaken. In the attempt to organize the maze of available occupational materials for requisitioning purposes, several basic bibliographic references and indexes were used. Although listed here, most are described in greater length in the Guidelines in the following section.

(1) Gertrude Forrester, Occupational Literature: An Annotated Bibliography, H. W. Wilson and Co., 950 University Avenue, Bronx, New York, 10452, 1964.

Lists over 5,000 pamphlets and about 1,500 books, including free materials. The basic reference in the field.

(2) NVGA Bibliography of Current Occupational Literature, National Vocational Guidance Association, 1605 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C., 20009, 1966.

A compilation of acceptable occupational and related materials which have been evaluated according to the NVGA standards.

(3) Counselor's Guide to Occupational and Other Manpower Information: An Annotated Bibliography of Selected Government Publications, Bulletin No. 1421, Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C., 20402, 1964.

In addition, an inquiry letter (see Figure No. 1) was sent to every organization listed in the Occupational Outlook Handbook, Job Facts, and Career Facts.

A number of form letters were used in writing for free materials.

Figure 1 presents the form letter used as a general inquiry. Figure 2 illustrates the letter used to request materials already known to project personnel. Figure 3 is the letter used to request multiple copies for distribution within the Newton system.

A publishers' card file is maintained with up-to-date addresses of all the sources used by the project.

Organization for Accessioning Materials in the Career Information Library

In accessioning of materials in the Newton career information library, the following procedures are followed:

(1) Each document or piece of occupational information is catalogued in a cross-index card file. Before it is filed, each document has prepared for it an author card and a title card. These cards follow the format used on standard library catalogue cards. Each card contains....

- author
- title
- classification number (D.O.T. or other)
- publisher
- year of publication
- number of pages
- price

The publishers' card file is checked to insure that the publisher (with complete address) of the document in question is on file. The publishers' card file should always contain an up-to-date listing of every publisher of occupational information materials.

(2) All purely occupational materials are classified with the six-digit Dictionary of Occupational Titles code number which most accurately describes the occupation or occupations in question. Where a document covers a broad range of occupations the first digit or first two digits of the most appropriate D.O.T. classification are used. If the document describes more than one specific occupation, the D.O.T. number of the occupation primarily emphasized in the document is assigned to it, followed by a listing of the D.O.T. numbers of the other occupations described.

(3) Material of occupational relevance, but not applicable to any specific occupation, is classified according to the "Supplementary Occupational and Educational Information" file coding and filed in the appropriate folder. Step #1 also applies to this type of information.

(4) The Newton career information library subscribes to a number of

Gentlemen:

Currently the Newton Public Schools is designing a system for collecting, storing, and retrieving occupational information, utilizing data processing techniques. Such a system requires a continuous updating and revision of the materials on hand relating to the various occupations.

If you currently distribute materials related to occupations in your field, would you please send us samples of the materials available? We are interested especially in materials that might enhance our vocational guidance program.

If you maintain a mailing list for the systematic distribution of such materials, would you add our address to your list? The appropriate address is specified below.

We appreciate any help you might be able to give us in this matter.

Dear Sirs:

As one aspect of its career guidance program, the Newton Public Schools attempt to make available to students (through their guidance counselors) a varity of occupational and educational information. In order to help alleviate duplication of effort of guidance counselors in requesting materials separately (and the associated labor of distributors in filling numerous requests for materials), we have initiated a procedure of requesting free and inexpensive materials in bulk for distribution from this office to Newton's school counselors (nearly 50 in number) and school libraries.

Would you please send 100 copies of each of the pamphlets listed below:
(3)

If there is a charge for any of the materials listed above, would you please quote us the per 100 price? Please do not ship materials for sale before receiving a purchase order from us.

Thank you very much for your cooperation and help in helping make these materials available to Newton students.

Sincerely,

occupational information services, notably those provided by Science Research Associates, Chronicle Guidance Publications, and Careers. These materials are ordered in duplicate. Steps 1, 2, and 3 apply to these materials also. One copy of these materials is added to the regular, comprehensive "Occupational Information File" or "Supplementary Occupational and Educational Information File." The second copy is added to the appropriate publisher's self-contained kit, a complete set of which is maintained on an up-to-date basis in the library.

(5) Catalogues, price listings, and similar cost reference materials are not accessioned according to the procedures outlined above. All catalogues are stored in a vertical file entitled "Commercial Catalogues -- Publishers of Occupational Materials." Before each newly acquired catalogue is filed, the publishers' card file is checked to insure that the information noted on the card is correct and up-to-date.

(6) All acquisitions that are purely reference materials are classified as "R" on their index cards and are shelved alphabetically by author within the "Reference" section. Similarly, professional books are designated "PR" and are filed on the "Professional" shelves. All bound materials (books, monographs, etc.) of a purely occupational nature are stored on bookshelves, alphabetically by author within three-digit D.O.T. categories.

Organization for Storage and Retrieval of Materials

Occupational information by nature varies considerably from the type of material usually stored in the typical, all-purpose library. That is, whereas general libraries are primarily involved in storage of hardbound materials that are commercially available and readily catalogued, occupational information may range in format from a single-page job description to a volume such as the massive Dictionary of Occupational Titles. Consequently, three parallel filing arrangements were designed for the Newton career information library. These include (1) a system for books, journals, and similar easily shelved materials, (2) a system for pamphlets, booklets, and similar soft-bound materials, and (3) a system for leaflets, single-page briefs, and similar "flimsy" material.

Books and other "Category 1" material are placed on regular bookshelves. (See Figure No. 4) "Category 2" pamphlets are stored in pamphlet boxes on bookshelves (See Figure No. 5), and "Category 3" materials are placed in a vertical file in a suspended folder arrangement in four-drawer files (see Figure No. 6). All three parallel groups utilize a similar coding system. All purely occupational materials are classified according to the 1965 Dictionary of Occupational Titles classification coding. For supplementary occupational and educational information of a supportive nature, a separate filing system was created, using a modified version of the Baer and Roeber filing plan. (1) Within the book division, in addition to a breakdown by single-digit occupational divisions, additional separate sections were created for (A) professional journals, (B) professional staff books relevant to career development, (C) references and directories, and (D) general student occupational workbooks and related materials. A smaller vertical file arrangement is set up for commercial publishers' catalogues. Sections are also set up for storage of filmstrips, records, tape recordings, slides, and films.

The specific organization of the three vertical file sections is as follows:

(1) Occupational Information File

> This file contains the library's primary collection of unbound occupational information. All materials are classified according to the Dictionary of Occupational Titles coding system. The suspended folders are labeled according to the D.O.T. two-digit coding. Within each suspended folder is a series of manila folders which break the two-digit classification down into the three-digit code. The first manila folder in each group repeats the two-digit code found on the suspended folder. This general folder contains all broad area information not classifiable into a three-digit grouping. Thus a subset of folder headings would read as follows:

21	Computing and Account-Recording Occupations
210	Bookkeepers

(3) Commercial Catalogues -- Publishers of Occupational Materials

This file contains catalogues and listings of career information available from various publishing sources. All folders are arranged alphabetically by publisher's name. The contents of this file must undergo continuous updating as new catalogues replace old ones.

Organization for Distribution of Materials

In preparing for distribution of free and inexpensive career information, the Newton program follows these procedures:

(1) Early in a school year a listing is assembled of all possible recipients of materials during that school year. This list includes such persons as school counselors, counselor interns, department heads, and librarians. This list is then sent to a local data processing center where multiple copies of pressure-sensitive addressing labels are prepared. These pre-addressed labels are a real advantage in facilitating the mailing of free materials to school personnel.

(2) Free or inexpensive materials ordered in duplicate are usually acquired in lots of 100. (2) When sufficient materials (10-15 different documents) have been accumulated, a mass mailing distribution is warranted. The Newton distribution is as follows:

   (a) one copy each to junior high and high school counselors, counselor interns, and junior college counselors.
   (b) five to ten copies to the department head (if appropriate) whose subject area is related to the occupation described in the literature.
   (c) two copies to the head librarians in each of the junior high school libraries.
   (d) one copy to the head librarian at the Newton Junior College.
   (e) remainder of material is divided among the high school libraries where single copies are kept on file and duplicates are distributed on a "take one" basis to students.

(3) When any pamphlet is mailed en masse to school personnel, a notation is made to that effect on the back of the title card for that pamphlet in the reference card file. This helps eliminate duplicate mailings of the same document in one school year. Repeat mailings of especially good materials in successive school years is permissable and desirable.

   Example: "Dist. to schools - 10/25/67"

(4) Single copies of all available materials are retained on file at the central career resource library. Occasionally, a given pamphlet may be revised and updated. Newly received materials are cross-checked with those on file to insure that the latest revision is retained and that all outdated materials are discarded.

(2) Schools of varying sizes would have to determine appropriate acquisition limits for their school.

GUIDELINES FOR DEVELOPING A CAREER INFORMATION LIBRARY

Those persons assuming responsibility for developing and maintaining a system for making information about career opportunities available need to recognize essential aspects of a successful program. The following guidelines are equally useful for consideration in establishing a new program or in evaluating existing practices. As such, they should be viewed as stimuli for thought rather than prescriptive recommendations.

In preparation for planning a career information service, the following basic references are useful:

Develop an Adequate Rationale or Statement of Purpose for Introducing the Service to Your School

Before undertaking the establishment of a career information service, one should ask the following questions: Why? For whom? What? When? How? The career information service should be congruent with the school's general objectives and organization, as well as be effectively integrated with the guidance program. Prior to moving ahead to develop the service, those responsible for establishing and conducting the program should review the field and lay ground rules for acquisitions, organization, and service.

An advisory committee composed of counselors, teachers, librarians, department heads, administrators, and representatives from business may be involved in establishing objectives and recommending administrative action. The Los Angeles County Superintendent of Schools Office's Guide to Occupational Materials in Career Planning (3) suggests that an advisory committee consider such questions as the following:

a. How important is career planning? What responsibilities should the school assume in helping students make realistic choices? Is career counseling provided for terminal students and school leavers as well as college preparatory students? Will information on occupations be disseminated through group units or by individual counseling?

b. What kinds of occupational information materials are most important? Will most students follow careers in the local labor market, or will a significant number seek jobs elsewhere?

   A survey of student goals and community jobs will help to answer these questions. It is expected that students will explore many fields as well as study one or two in some depth.

c. How much can the school afford to budget for books and other publications?

   Answers to "a" and "b" will determine the budget needs. Community resources such as service clubs may be interested in providing materials.

(3) Los Angeles County Superintendent of Schools Office, Guide to Occupational Materials in Career Planning, revised edition, LACO No. 45, Los Angeles, May, 1962.

d. Who will assume the responsibility for selecting, purchasing, and organizing materials in the occupations file?

What is everyone's responsibility is no one's. Duplications can be avoided if all requisitions are handled by one person. Savings can be effected through unit purchasing, especially in multi-school districts. The local advisory committee will of necessity have to evaluate its own needs in accordance with its policies. It will be found that certain kinds of materials are more valuable than others. Some occupations will need to be stressed more than others. Community resources may be found that augment the school budget.

The reader should remember that it is usually easier to obtain personnel and funds to support activities which have a strong supporting rationale and justification. The previously listed professional references all contain extended statements of why provision of occupational information should be an intrinsic element in a comprehensive guidance program.

Responsibility for Coordinating the Career Information Service Should Be Given to One Person

Because the processes of an information service require regular supervision, one guidance professional in a school should be allotted time to organize and maintain the service. Naturally, this person should have some knowledge of information sources and processes of acquisition, evaluation, storage, and dissemination of career information materials. Ideally, the person coordinating the career information service should have clerical assistance available to perform such functions as ordering, classifying, filing, distributing, and similar details of a routine nature. In some schools, student assistants may be available to help out with such details. Generally, the coordinator should limit his activities to professional functions pertaining to discovering information sources, establishing procedures, evaluation of materials, and developing new ways of communicating information to students and staff.

The amount of professional time devoted to such an information function needs to be considered in the context of the size and resources of a particular school. One-third of a counselor's time and the equivalent of a half-time clerk are perhaps minimal levels for developing a workable service.

Funds Must Be Budgeted for Career Materials on a Regular Basis

Career information libraries are rapidly outdated and need continuous updating. Long-range plans need to be developed to permit acquisition and replacement of reference materials of established quality. Typical of such resources needing periodic replacement are the Occupational Outlook Handbook and the Dictionary of Occupational Titles.

Since financial support is the crucial factor in expanding and replacing materials in the career resource service, funds for acquisition of materials need to be available on a regular basis. Without adequate financial support, maintenance of an effective information service is jeopardized, if not totally unworkable.

Although free materials play an important part in the career information service, funds are needed for publications that may vary in price from a few cents to several dollars. The size of the budget required relates directly to the stage of development of the career information library - whether it is a new service just getting established or an existing library that simply requires maintenance. The size of student enrollment and number of schools in the system also influence budget considerations.

To assemble a collection as extensive as that contained in Appendix A would probably require an expenditure of $8,000 for materials only. The cost of staff salaries, facilities, equipment, etc., would be additional. Thus we emphasize the necessity for conceiving of the career information library as a resource requiring development over a period of several years. Some schools who have experienced persistent difficulty in obtaining regular funding for informational resources have turned to local civic organizations for financial assistance. Although such efforts should never substitute requests through the normal educational budget, community group support may be useful in helping initially to establish such an information service. Once fully established, a career information library through selective acquisitioning can be maintained on an annual budget of $400 - $600 for materials.

Establish Criteria for Acquiring Materials

The total volume of occupational information available is too great to enable any but the largest school systems to maintain exhaustive files. Consequently, acquisition should be guided by clear criteria. Who will be the recipients of the information? What information is most appropriate to this clientele? How is information best presented to these users? These and related questions should serve in defining the limits within which an information service can best function. One of the shortest routes to failure -- given limited financial resources -- is trying to be all things to all persons. It is preferable to define one's objectives and to try to perform well within those limits.

Criteria for evaluating information are also necessary. The National Vocational Guidance Association has produced a useful set of guidelines for preparing and evaluating occupational materials. (4) Unfortunately, these criteria are probably too elaborate for evaluating each new acquisition to the local information service. It is perhaps best for the person coordinating the information service to have a working knowledge of these criteria and then to make rough evaluations of materials as they are received. This may sound less than ideal, but time limitations usually preclude any more rigorous efforts.

(4) "Guidelines for Preparing and Evaluating Occupational Materials," 1605 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C., National Vocational Guidance Association, 1964.

Locate Reliable Sources of Information

The major sources of career information may be grouped as follows:

Professional associations and organizations
Commercial publishers
Business and industry
Government - national, state, and local

Materials may be acquired by writing directly to the source, or items may be pre-evaluated by searching any of the available bibliographic indexes. So that the reader may be aware of existing indexes with their strengths and limitations, these resources are here reviewed:

(1) The NVGA Bibliography of Current Occupational Literature, 1966 edition, is a product of the Career Information Review service of the National Vocational Guidance Association. This volume, which has seen successive, irregular editions since 1956, compiles the listings of "Current Occupational Literature" found in The Vocational Guidance Quarterly. The 1966 edition compiles the listing from Spring, 1963, through Summer, 1965.

All entries are classified as to type of publication (14 categories) and evaluated according to a four-point scale, ranging from highly recommended to not recommended. (Unfortunately, explanation of the "not recommended" category was inadvertently omitted from the explanation of the classification and coding system used.) Entries are listed alphabetically by title within alphabetical subject headings adapted from Wilma Bennett's "Occupations Filing Plan and Bibliography".

The NVGA Bibliography makes no pretense of being either exhaustive or comprehensive. The listings represent literature submitted by 131 publishers whose publications were reviewed by the Committee.

This volume includes an index of publishers' names and addresses. No entries include the Dictionary of Occupational Titles classification number, a severe limitation. Earlier editions contain listings reviewed during earlier time periods. Thus each new edition supplements, rather than duplicates or replaces, earlier editions. A volume of 114 pp., it is available at $1.00 per copy from Publications Sales, American Personnel and Guidance

Association, 1605 New Hampshire Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C., 20009.

(2) Directly related to the NVGA Bibliography, of course, is "Current Occupational Literature", a section of The Vocational Guidance Quarterly. This section provides the most recent listing of the Career Information Review Service Committee as they are reviewed and rated by the Committee. This service includes the same evaluation scheme as the Bibliography.

(3) The Counselor's Information Service (S. Norman Feingold, editor) is "a quarterly annotated bibliography of current literature on educational and vocational guidance". Published in September, December, February, and May, this periodical provides non-evaluative listings arranged alphabetically by title within subject headings arbitrarily assigned. This well-advertised service concentrates primarily in listing substantial items such as books, monographs, etc. It is available at $7.00 per year from B'nai B'rith Vocational Service, 1640 Rhode Island Avenue, N.W., Washington, D.C., 20036.

(4) Guidance Exchange (P.O. 1464, Grand Central P.O., New York, N.Y., 10017) is a "bimonthly digest of current recommended guidance literature". Published bimonthly (September-October, November-December, January-February, March-April), an annual subscription costs $15. Covering many areas of guidance, education, and psychology, this annotated digest includes many occupational materials in its listings. Materials are arranged alphabetically within subject areas. No D.O.T. classification numbers are included in the listings of occupational information contained in this bibliography.

(5) H. W. Wilson Company, 950 University Avenue, Bronx, New York, 10452, publishes the Vertical File Index of Pamphlets ($8 yearly), a monthly publication which notes significant pamphlet publications in the United States. Also cumulated annually, this bibliographic service usually notes good occupational information in pamphlet form as it is published. Its listings are non-evaluative.

(6) The Career Guidance Index (Careers, Largo, Florida, 33540) is a listing of free and inexpensive career materials. Its listings are well-annotated and include D.O.T. classification numbers. Provided as part of a monthly service during the school year, the Career Guidance Index is not offered for sale apart from the information service.

(7) The Career Index is a bibliographic service published by Chronicle Guidance Publications, Inc., Moravia, New York, 13118. Issued monthly during the school year (September-April), this service is available at $10 per year. Its listings are annotated with ordering information and are arranged alphabetically by publisher-distributor. Listings are not evaluated and no D.O.T.

numbers are noted. This service is also compiled and indexed annually. One unique feature of this service is its inclusion of pre-printed mailing cards which can be used in acquiring certain materials in the listing.

(8) The Subject Guide to Books in Print, U.S.A., edited by Sarah L. Prakken, is published annually by R. R. Bowker Company, 1180 Avenue of the Americas, New York, New York, 10036 ($17.50). A standard reference in the book trade, this prodigious volume lists over 185,000 titles from 1600 publishers. These listings are grouped into subject areas, following headings assigned by the Library of Congress. Many books of occupational relevance are listed under such headings as Occupations, Job Analysis, Professions, Vocation, Vocational Guidance, Vocational Interest, etc. Books are also listed under such headings as Agriculture as a Profession, Music as a Profession, and the like. The reader is also instructed to investigate the subdivision "Vocational Guidance" under the primary headings of industries and trades.

(9) Guidance Publications in Print is a proposed series of twelve volumes to be produced by Associated Publishers' Guidance Publications Center (Los Altos, California, 94022). Volume I-III, the "Occupational Information Group", are entitled I, Specific Jobs and Job Specifics; II, The Job World; and III, Occupational Autobiography, Biography, Fiction and Humor. To date, only two of the proposed twelve volumes have appeared. Books, monographs, pamphlets and the like are listed alphabetically in a subject and title-oriented bibliography. Author's name, number of pages, size in cm., price, and date of publication are noted. Publishers' names and addresses are not listed since Associated Publishers serves as a distributor for all the publications listed in its bibliographic catalog. No evaluations are provided and D.O.T. classification numbers have been omitted. Admittedly an ambitious project, this bibliographic service has not been developed as rapidly as originally intended.

(10) Certain locally produced occupational information bibliographies have also served a limited purpose in their geographic areas. The Guide to Occupational Materials in Career Planning prepared by the Los Angeles County Superintendent of Schools Office (LACO No. 45; May, 1962) is typical of such limited circulation bibliographies.

(11) The Occupational Index, an annotated bibliography of career information, is published quarterly by Personnel Services, Inc. (P.O. Box 306, Jaffrey, New Hampshire, 03452; annual subscription $7.50).

This periodical provides an alphabetical subject index of occupations. This index enables the reader then to refer to the lists of occupational materials which are grouped alphabetically within a price grouping. Reference data is complete, and the annotations are well written. The Occupational Index has appeared irregularly of late and may be passing out of existence.

(12) The Educators Guide to Free Guidance Materials is an annual publication of Educators Progress Service, Randolph, Wisconsin, 53956. This volume lists materials on guidance, including occupational information, such as books, pamphlets, charts, tape recordings, films and filmstrips. Price $7.50.

(13) The Counselor's Guide to Occupational and Other Manpower Information (U.S. Department of Labor, Bulletin No. 1421, November, 1964) is an annotated bibliography of selected government publications. This volume is the most useful compilation of government materials assembled to date. Materials are grouped by subject, and helpful ordering information is included. (For sale by the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C., 20402; price $.50.)

Many of these bibliographic services overlap considerably, and no bibliography pretends to be definitive. Moreover, several of the occupational information bibliographic services currently in existence appear to be "shoestring" efforts, financially speaking. Comprehensive works such as Forrester's Occupational Information Literature serve a valuable though transient function, since they are quickly outdated. No attempt has been made to merge such a comprehensive volume with periodic supplements. None of the occupational information bibliographies available is structured along the format of the Dictionary of Occupational Titles classification coding. The Career Guidance Index is the only periodical even to include D.O.T. numbers. Most bibliographies are arranged alphabetically by job title and are intended to stand as discrete units. Any transfer application to any procedure or storage device based on the D.O.T. is hampered.

The reader will find the bibliography appended to this volume a helpful resource in locating materials describing occupations grouped by D.O.T. number.

Develop a Workable Classification and Storage System

This element is usally the "Achilles heel" of any career information service. A system is only as effective as are the procedures for classifying, filing, and retrieving materials. Once a library is underway, materials come in so rapidly that the staff is inundated unless they have a well-developed plan for accessioning materials.

The writers feel that the Dictionary of Occupational Titles classification scheme is the only one sufficiently comprehensive to encompass the career information materials currently available. The latest revision of the D.O.T. is designed to encompass the future as well as the current occupational world. The D.O.T.'s classification structure has been reconceptualized to increase its values as a counseling aid and more closely to correlate information, counseling, and placement activities. The usefulness of the present D.O.T. classification will become increasingly evident as the subsequent areas of placement and follow-up are presented.

Utilize Good Business Management Practices

Generally, the career information service acquisitions procedures involve two major areas: free materials and materials to be purchased. Requests for free materials should be processed on school stationery via a standard duplicated form letter. Illustrations of such letters were presented in a previous section. A first request for material of unknown quality should be for a single copy. Once evaluation of an item has been made, and the item has been identified as useful, a request for multiple copies may be sent.

Materials to be purchased may be acquired through the established school purchasing procedures. However, items of occupational information frequently are so inexpensive as to make purchase order paper work quite cumbersome. A more workable procedure is to have a petty cash fund set up for use by the career information service.

A method for recording orders and receipt of materials needs to be established. One workable method involves maintaining a chronological listing of vendors, material ordered, date of order, cost, and date of receipt. Once established, such a system might become the responsibility of a clerical aid.

Establish Open Communication Networks

Clear understanding among all parties should exist prior to and be maintained following introduction of the service. Efforts need to be correlated with existing school services to minimize overlap and duplication. Because few schools have adequate career information services, a strong public relations effort may be necessary to overcome inertial resistance toward this new development.

Since career information is sometimes successfully communicated through normal instructional programs, the career information service structure should welcome contributions or requests from teachers related to their subject area interests.

Some well-developed career informational resources have been unsuccessful simply because they have not communicated their availability to potential users. The career information library can be publicized through daily teacher bulletins, student newspaper stories, homeroom talks, bulletin boards, displays in student lounges and commons rooms, and the like. Some of these publicity channels are discussed at greater length in Section V, The Career Guidance Resource Center.

Location May Determine Effectiveness

To be successful, a career information library needs a major flow of students past the facility. Information must be easily accessible to the potential user.

The career information library must have access to standard storage facilities such as shelf space and filing cabinets. Visibility is a critical consideration in determining the type of storage and display units to be acquired. Career information, when effectively displayed, can have a high inherent attractiveness for students.

Wherever the career library is housed, it should be near a major student traffic flow. Sometimes small rooms or sections of rooms can be located near counselors' offices, near the school library, near the cafeteria, etc.

Work Closely With Existing School Library Services

Many school libraries have the beginnings of a career resource library in their present collections. The counselor may find it useful to collaborate with the librarian in setting up library procedures. Perhaps a particular school might find it advantageous to merge the career resource materials with the existing library collection to avoid unnecessary fragmentation of effort and facilities. Also, the counselor initiating a career information effort will appreciate the library science skills essential to selecting, housing, and disseminating materials.

Keep Career Information Up-to-date

Up-dating the career information library and replacing missing items requires an annual inventory as well as continuous weeding. Most publications pertaining to careers are highly transient in nature and become obsolete after about five years. Materials received in subscription services frequently replace earlier distributed items; as revisions are received, earlier editions should be discarded.

A continuous research effort must be maintained to uncover newly published materials -- especially material pertaining to new career fields.

Administrative Rules and Regulations

Administrative regulations for using the library should be sensible and practical, designed to facilitate rather than to inhibit the use of the information. "Red tape" should be minimized. All materials should be readily accessible to the user, and the user should be able to check out materials for use in the classroom or at home. Much material can be made available in "free ... take one" racks.

A general rule of thumb is to permit as relaxed security regulations as possible, even though such a condition might require the occasional replacement of lost materials. It is far better for a few items to be lost in a heavily used library than for nothing to be lost in a relatively unused facility. This relaxed atmosphere cannot be too emphatically stressed, for we have detected a staff tendency toward protectiveness and tight security.

PLANNING THE NEWTON JOB PLACEMENT SERVICE

Background

A total educational program for a student would include some work experience. For purposeful career development, some work experiences are more valuable than others. The opportunity to evaluate numerous job possibilities and to make application to those which would be most appropriate for their present level of vocational maturity is a valuable career decision-making experience. This goal could most nearly be achieved by having a listing of all job vacancies for students at a location where they are receiving their educational and vocational counseling. The opportunity for the student to choose can create the expectation of choice, and serve as a trial model for similar choices to be made later in life. The denial of job choice during the first work experiences can develop in the individual a pattern of accepting the first apparently suitable job available before an adequate search for alternatives has been made.

In planning a job placement program for Newton's schools, study was made of the history, the theory, and the actual practice of students taking jobs. Historically, the first guidance activities centered around the choice of an occupation and subsequently finding a specific job in that field. From this initial singular emphasis on job choice and placement, some leaders in the field now find no place in school counseling for job placement and consider it only a community service. Placement is indeed a community service, but it is much more. It is an integral part of the vocational decision-making process, and as such needs to function within the school setting as an interaction between the student and his counselor. Surveys indicate that vocational placement incorporated into the counseling process not only has a theoretical basis, but also has the concrete and pragmatic advantages of increased wages and increased satisfaction on the job; unfortunately, this important service is more often an informal arrangement, revolving around a technical education program, a teacher, a counselor, or an isolated individual who is providing an informal service. The formalization of vocational placement as a service provided by the school and available to all students has been one of the primary purposes of the Newton project.

First Steps in Organizing Newton's Job Placement Service

A survey was made of literature on job placement and material was gathered from the several Massachusetts school systems which have been successfully operating job placement programs. A good look was then taken at the Newton school system, at the community resources and at the needs of the students.

Three surveys were used. One, a follow-up of graduates discussed in Section IV, showed that only ten percent of students getting jobs within two years of graduation had received their information from any community-based placement agency. Another survey, made of all students in one high school in March, found that 43 percent of the students were working regularly, that one-sixth of the student body was looking for a job then, and that over 70 percent of the non-working students planned to have a job by summer (Figure 1). The third survey of students was conducted over a period of a month of those applying for working permits (Figure 2). (All persons ages 14-17 are required by Massachusetts law to apply for these work permits before they start a job.) Only four percent of those starting jobs that month had used a school placement service, and no one had used a community placement service. In addition, half of the students were taking the only job they knew of.

The next step was to study the programs already involved in job placement.

What is the most important reason for you taking the job you took?

In the school, this included a number of persons who either received information about job openings from employers or who knew students who wanted jobs. However, there was no one person who knew of all the job openings; nor was there a system for distributing information about job openings to students or staff.

The analysis of facts seemed both to indicate that there was not an active job placement program available to the students, and that there was definite need for such an activity. The decision was made to start the program in the spring, as both job opportunities and student requests would be greatest at this time of year. (Another school system might prefer to start in the fall with a small volume of activity, giving themselves time to adjust and make necessary modifications before the really busy time of spring and summer employment.)

Community Advisory Committee

Because we anticipated high student demand for jobs, we wanted as many employer listings as possible. We preferred risking a disappointed employer to disillusioning a student looking for his first job. To obtain the maximum number of listings, we went directly to the business community for advice, and through them set up an advisory committee.

First, the presidents of all the major civic clubs were contacted by telephone. The job placement program was explained to them, and a request was made to contact their members, either by a personal appearance at one of their meetings, or through information printed in a regular newsletter. Two things were to be asked in the presentation to the club members: one was a request to list their job openings through the school placement program; the other was for volunteers interested in being members of the advisory committee. A comparison of response between the two methods indicated that personal appearance was more effective than just placing information in the newsletter. Using both approaches together was the most productive.

The volunteers responding from the civic clubs provided half of the eventual eighteen-member committee. The local Chamber of Commerce agreed to provide the chairman. The other half were selected in order to balance the committee according to types of businesses, responsibilities in the business, geographic location in the community, and ethnic representation. Not all members represented business, since one was a clergyman and one represented the community council.

The good public image provided by the advisory committee members and by their organizations was in itself well worth the time spent in forming the committee. The letterhead listing these names was mailed to more than 1,500 prospective employers. One committee member provided by the Chamber of Commerce handled all newspaper publicity, sending in stories on Chamber news release paper and reaching publication in virtually all the local and metropolitan area newspapers.

The committee also provided useful practical advice. In the process of asking members to serve, the school organizer got suggestions from most of the individuals involved. The initial most important question was: to what type of communication would the employer respond? We were told that employers would react favorably if 1) the request came from a group of which they were a member or knew of personally; 2) if the appeal was endorsed by a respected member of the community; 3) if a personal request was made at their place of business; and 4) if definite advantages could be pointed out to the employer. Since a maximum number of openings were desired, the plan developed was based on all these elements.

After the basic plan for contacting employers was developed, the advisory committee met to discuss and advise on the modification of the plan. This meeting of the committee provided an excellent exchange of ideas and provided the benefit of collective thinking. The committee was also quite interested in the broader implications of early work experience on the eventual vocational decisions of the students.

A placement program could operate without such an advisory committee, but the aid provided in publicity and ideas more than repaid the effort spent in organizing the committee.

The Steering Committee

A working committee essential to the organization of the job placement program was composed of school personnel. This steering committee represented all of the school groups that would have an interest in the operation of the job placement program. Each high school and the junior college was represented. Their representatives included persons from the guidance and instructional staff and persons who had worked as individuals in job placement within their school. Other representatives were from the work-study program, the attendance office, the central guidance office, and the junior high schools. The Division of Employment Security was also represented. This made a total of thirteen persons, a good operational size for the committee.

All operating plans for the collection and dissemination of job openings were approved by this committee. To activate the program required only two meetings of this committee, but these were two important meetings. In the first meeting the plan of operation was presented in writing for modification and approval. The name selected for the program was Jobs for Youth. The plan was written by the organizer after consulting with each of the members individually, getting their ideas, and from these ideas developing a plan. After the plan was approved, it was tried on a limited scale, and the results were reported to the committee for review and further modification. The plan was then put into full operation. This method of developing and testing a plan seemed satisfactory and is a method of program development that is recommended for the reader's consideration.

Finding and Listing Job Openings

Since one of the criteria for measuring the success or failure of a program like this is the ability to find job opportunities for students, the organization for gathering the job openings is of critical importance. The general contact through civic clubs or newspapers was not expected to elicit sufficient response. Contact had to be more personal; this meant knowing specifically to whom we were addressing our appeal. One of the first activities, therefore, was to compile a list of employers. We had several good sources. Probably the best were the student working papers for the previous two years; these list the employer's name and address and the type of work for which the student was employed. This list was particularly good because we knew that all of these employers had hired teenagers in the past. Another good source was a Chamber of Commerce booklet listing most of the businesses in town. We also used the city directory and the yellow pages of the telephone book.

This provided us with a basic mailing list. The letters were sent shortly after the contact with the civic clubs and at the same time the newspaper publicity was appearing. Letters were mailed to nearly all Newton employers and many in surrounding communities, over 1,500 in all. We tried to emphasize benefits the program offered to the employer such as having qualified students referred for the job. We also tried to rouse a sense of civic responsibility to the youth of the community. Providing a job for a student would allow the student to earn some money, to spend time constructively, and to have an introduction into some career field. The purpose of the letter was to reinforce the idea of cooperation with the program, and to provide employers with additional information just prior to being personally contacted.

Although letters had been sent to businesses outside Newton, only businesses within the city would be contacted personally. Since up to a thousand businesses were involved, the only group large enough to make this individual contact in the relatively short period of time involved was the student body. Students also have a rather limited amount of time, so if most businesses were to be contacted many students would necessarily be involved, which in itself was important for another reason. Since the program was new, most students did not know of it. Asking them to help gave them a personal identification with the program and their personal involvement provided important publicity in the school.

The organization of students developed to contact employers was a chain of command organization with emphasis on individual student responsibility, but with support for all students by having them work in pairs. Two student leaders were recruited from each of the dozen "villages" in Newton to be responsible for contacting employers in their village.

Two meetings were held with the student leaders before they contacted any potential employers. At the first meeting the program was explained to them, questions were answered, and their participation was requested. In the second meeting the list of businesses they would contact was given to them. These businesses were in close geographic proximity. Also, some suggestions were given in printed form about how to make the contact and what to say. (Figure 3).

Together these students formed the initial contact group. Using the two student leaders in each village allowed us to test this method of getting job information before the whole plan was initiated. About two weeks before the

You are going to help a new project in Newton, Jobs for Youth. You as a surveyor will be the first and only youth contact that the employer will have this year. Since this is a new program you will need to explain it to him, although each employer will have received information in the mail. Your desire to accomplish this task, your appearance, your tact and method of contact must give each individual employer the best impression of what Newton youth is like.

Personal contacts will be made during spring vacation week April 17 to 21. If you cannot make them then they can be made either just before or just after that, but you must let the village leader know.

1. All contacts are to be personal contacts and by a pair of students if at all possible. You may have to go back more than once to contact the right person.
2. Do not make the actual contact by phone. We want to explain the program to employers in person.
3. Make every contact assigned to you. To be successful we must have 100% effort and participation.

Instructions to Students Making Contacts.

1. Dress neatly: coat, tie, etc.
2. Identify yourself by name and whom you represent (Jobs for Youth of the Newton Public Schools).
3. Briefly state your purpose (to find job opportunities for this summer for all Newton students) and to explain the program briefly (having all the jobs listed in one place will give the student greater choice which will mean students will be more interested in their work. The students can use the jobs to explore vocational possibilities).
4. If the employer has a job opening, fill out the Jobs for Youth card completely. In addition get:
    a) telephone number
    b) a complete job description
    c) the age of worker required
    d) salary
5. If the employer has no job opening, fill out the mimeographed sheet.
6. Record any other comments the employer makes that will give his reaction to this project or will be useful.
7. Return the cards and sheets as directed by your village leader. If you have any question or problems, please let him know immediately.
8. SELL YOURSELF AND THE PROJECT. WE WILL HAVE ONLY AS MANY JOBS AS THE SURVEYORS ARE ABLE TO REPORT. THE MORE JOBS EACH SURVEYOR FINDS THE GREATER THE CHOICES.

student contact was planned, letters and information sheets about the schools were sent to ten businessmen in each village. (Figures 4 and 4a). Those businessmen who did not respond to these letters were contacted by the students. As soon as contact was completed, the students turned in their information from the employers.

In one area we kept close account of the response to different methods of contact. Sixty letters were sent to employers. Within two weeks, three had responded with job openings. Student contacts secured 14 additional listings. This convinced us that personal contact was important to the successful location of jobs.

Because this trial run was successful, the second phase of the plan which called for contacting all Newton businesses was initiated. The student leaders had also been given responsibility for securing two students for about every ten businesses in their village. In cases where the student leaders had difficulty in getting volunteers to help, a notice in the student bulletin secured the necessary response. One meeting was held with these students during which they were given their lists of businesses. They were asked to return their responses from the businesses within a week. The student leaders were to check with the students working in their area to see if they had completed their assignments. Enough students completed their assignments, so that this part of the program could be considered a definite aid in locating job openings.

The motivation involved in getting the student leaders was a chance for a leadership role in a new school activity, and this activity would result in a greater choice of summer jobs. This interested almost all of the students contacted as potential leaders for the project. About ninety percent of the leaders followed through on their commitment. The motivation for the other

Do you have a job a junior college, high school, or junior high youth could fill this summer? Such an opportunity can help some young person spend a profitable summer both learning through a work experience and earning a profitable income.

In the Newton Public Schools are many intelligent and capable students who have registered their interest in summer work. We are now turning to you as their potential employer with a request to list any openings you might have.

A single listing can have distribution to students through the entire school system under the program we are now starting. Students will be encouraged to apply for those jobs which would be most closely linked to their future vocational plans. This will be done through their counselors and subject matter teachers. This should help assure you an applicant who would be qualified for the job and one who could turn the work experience into an educational opportunity. To do this we are particularly interested in opportunities where a student could work with someone who is a professional or has advanced training or skills, as most of our students will be furthering their education. Some of these jobs might be volunteer positions. A few students do not take advanced schooling and they will be seeking permanent work this summer. Listings in these additional areas are requested.

Would you please call in your job opening or mail the enclosed card to us? To demonstrate our sincerity in trying to locate jobs, in about two weeks students will be contacting those Newton employers from whom we have not heard.

Sincerely yours,
Duncan F. Circle

"The most creative school system in the U.S. today." Time Magazine, Jan., 1964.

Students from our schools are capable of filling all the unskilled jobs you have and we certainly solicit your listing of these jobs with us. Below are briefly listed some of the specialized areas our students study. Perhaps some of your job openings can use these abilities.

NEWTON JUNIOR COLLEGE, a fully accredited junior college with over 500 degree-seeking students. Many of these students work part-time during the college year and full-time during the summer.

College majors include:

- Liberal Arts
- Business Administration
- General
- Data Processing
- Electronic Technology
- Nursing
- Secretarial (beginning Sept., 1967)

NEWTON HIGH SCHOOL and NEWTON SOUTH HIGH SCHOOL enroll more than 4,050 students. All of these students have a common core of English and Social Studies. In addition, students will emphasize some of the following:

- Arts: Art Major 1, 2 and 3; Ceramics and Art Crafts
- Commercial: Typing 1 and 2, Shorthand 1 and 2, Secretarial Practice, Office Machines, Bookkeeping 1 and 2, Salesmanship, Advertising, and Merchandising
- Home Economics: Home Economics 1 and 2, Advanced Foods, Clothing and Design, and Child Development
- Industrial Arts: Introduction to Electricity, Small Machines, Fabricating Techniques and Tools. Technical Drawing, including advanced machine and architectural drawing and descriptive geometry. Introduction to Electronics
- Language: French, German, Latin, Russian and Spanish
- Math: Plane and Solid Geometry, Algebra I and II, College Algebra, Trigonometry, Analytical Geometry, Differential and Integral Calculus, Probability and Statistics, Matrix Algebra, and Computers
- Science: Biology, Advanced Biology, Chemistry, Advanced Chemistry and Physics

NEWTON TECHNICAL HIGH SCHOOL enrolls 282 students. Founded in 1912, it provides a full three years of technical training in:

- Auto Mechanics
- Drafting
- Electricity
- Electronics
- Machines
- Mill Carpentry
- Printing
- Sheet Metal

JUNIOR HIGH SCHOOLS. We have five junior highs which have many students eager for the opportunity to work this summer. Sorry, we cannot take the responsibility for listing baby sitting jobs. There are a number of ways youngsters of junior high age might help you.

student interviewers was the chance for a greater job choice for themselves, and the appeal of helping to start a new program in the school. About sixty percent of these students completed their commitment. If the faculty person organizing the program has the time for contact with each of the students, this would probably increase the percentage of student completion, but since time was limited, the substitution of student follow-through was an acceptable alternative.

Our total public relations program was so successful that it does not appear necessary to conduct the personal solicitation again; a selective mailing on an annual basis will be used. However, if personal contact were to be done again, we would instigate a few changes. The businesses should have been evaluated more closely as to their potential for student employment; those with a very low potential should have been eliminated. Letters could still be sent to them, but the students would not have to make the contact. The students found it very discouraging to interview one unlikely business after another, and this resulted in some assignments not being finished. Some screening was done and this was useful, but it should have been more extensive. The first screening was by the attendance officer, who indicated places where students could not legally work. Also, some of the advisory committee members were contacted to evaluate the businesses in their village. This was very helpful and it should have been done for all of the villages. This could be a student leader assignment.

In making the list of businesses it was helpful to have each employer listed on a separate index card. At first the cards were arranged alphabetically while the list was being compiled. After the list was complete, the cards were then sorted according to village and then further sorted into groups of ten adjacent businesses. Three copies were made of each grouping of ten. One was kept in the office, one was given to the student leaders and one was given to the students actually contacting the business.

OPERATING THE JOB PLACEMENT SERVICE

Operating the Central Placement Center

Job orders from potential employers come by mail or telephone, student surveyor report, through newspapers, or from an informant saying he knows of an opening. However the first contact is made, it is important to get complete information about the job and the employer's expectations. Experience has shown the only way to do this is by direct verbal contact with the employer. If the original information does not come directly from the employer, he should be contacted by telephone to verify the information received and to give additional information. Even if the employer sends the information by mail, he should be contacted by telephone as most have not clearly defined the job and what they want in an employee.

The information needed includes:

1. Firm name
2. Address
3. Phone number. Do they want the student to phone ahead of time?
4. Person to whom student should apply
5. Job title and complete job description including:
    a. all duties
    b. the level of skill expected of applicant
    c. any special qualifications
6. Age
7. Sex
8. Number of openings
9. Number of students employer will interview
10. Duration of the job: permanent, summer, part-time
11. Salary
12. Starting date
13. Hours
14. Date job order received at our office

After complete information is available, the first decision to be made is how to advertise the job opening. This usually is dependent upon the age and the qualifications of the possible applicants. To a lesser extent, it is dependent upon the location of the job and the number of openings. Experience has indicated most jobs should be listed at all schools.

Originally the jobs were carefully separated between the two high schools and the junior college according to job location and age requirements. This meant typing and mimeographing three different bulletins. Many of the same jobs were on each bulletin, but some were different. After doing this for some time, we realized this was taking too much time. Also it was found that as students were willing to travel across town for a job that interested them, location was not a good criteria for deciding in which school to list a job.

Each opening was given a job order number for identification purposes. The complete information is recorded on a job order form (Figure 5), and a permanent copy is kept in the central office. In addition, a complete job order form is made up for each school to which the job opening is sent. With the job order form is sent an appropriate number of cards of introduction (Figure 6), usually three for every opening. These are sent directly to the job placement counselor of the school.

All information except for firm name, address, phone number and person to whom to apply is put on a bulletin to be sent to the school (Figure 7). Information as to the general location of the job is included on the bulletin. The bulletin, mimeographed for multiple distribution, is sent to each counselor, the department heads, the principal, one for each house for their bulletin board, and two for the job placement counselor. Also, a bulletin is sent to each employer listed on it along with evaluation forms (Figure 8) for students that the employer will interview, and a cover letter (Figure 9). (The sending of interview evaluation forms was discontinued, as very few employers were returning them. Even some employers on the advisory committee who had originally suggested this were not returning these forms.

Thank you very much for listing your job opening with Jobs for Youth. I hope in a few days some students will be contacting you as applicants for the job you listed. Only students sent by the school will have a card of introduction with Jobs for Youth written across the top. Would you please take the card and return it directly to us with your decision about employing the student checked on the card?

All of the students that we send should meet the minimum qualifications that you listed with us. However, you as the employer naturally have the responsibility of making the final selection of your employee. We hope the job interview and the work experience with you can be a valuable learning opportunity for the student. This is the reason the school is providing this service to students and employers.

For many students this will be one of their first job interviews. You can make this a positive learning experience for the student by checking the enclosed form for each student you interview and returning it to us. We appreciate your cooperation in listing your job opening and returning the information about the interview to us.

If we can be of further help do not hesitate to contact us.

Sincerely yours,

Duncan Circle

One of the reasons was indifference. Another was that for summer and part-time jobs the employers were only briefly talking with students and did not really know enough about them to complete the form.)

The student learns about the job opening by checking a bulletin board where notices are regularly posted. When he sees an interesting opening, he goes to the job placement counselor who has the responsibility of seeing that the student has the specific qualifications that are being requested, particularly in the areas of age and skill. The counselor then tells the student which firm has the opening, and in some cases the student then decides not to apply for the position. If the student is still interested, he is given a card of introduction and an instruction sheet on how to make a good presentation at a job interview. The job placement counselor gives the student the opportunity to discuss the job interview. The job is considered to be closed at the school as soon as the cards of introduction are gone. The school notifies the central placement office which in turn verifies this with the employer.

After receiving the card of introduction, the student telephones the employer and requests an appointment. After the interview the employer is to return the card of introduction and the completed interview evaluation form. This lets the center know if the student was hired for the job. If the student is hired, the employer is contacted to see if the position is closed or if he desires to hire other students. If the position is closed, that job number is marked closed on the next bulletin, so the corresponding job numbers on bulletins still posted can be marked out. The completed card of introduction and the interview form are returned to the placement counselor or the student's counselor at the school so they will know the results of the interview.

One of the principal problems has been with school-employer communication. Once the original notification of the job had been received, considerably less than half of the employers informed us when the job was closed. A few called in and a few more returned the card of introduction. In the majority of cases it was necessary to call the employer after about two weeks or after several cards of introduction had been given to students. It is important to keep the listing accurate because students soon lose faith in an information service such as this when it gives inaccurate information.

Three files are maintained. One is of job order forms separated into those representing jobs still open and those which are closed. Another file is of all employers listed alphabetically with one card for each employer (Figure 10). When the employer lists a job opening that is recorded on the front and when a student is hired that is noted on the back of the form. The third file is catagorized by six digit D.O.T. job classification. Each employer who has hired a student has a card. Behind each classification of work is a listing of all employers who have hired students for such work. The card includes employer's name, address, telephone number, person to contact, and age of student hired. This information was accumulated through the working paper applications and Jobs for Youth listings.

Operating the Individual School's Job Placement Center

Each school has the responsibility of devising its own system for distributing the job openings to students in their school. This system has to mesh with the services of the central placement office which include a mimeographed listing of jobs for wide distribution, a complete description on the job order card and several cards of introduction. Each school has a coordinator in charge of preliminary screening of students.

An initial decision of the steering committee was that students desiring jobs should be registered. The registration was to serve several purposes: it would provide a listing of available student skills; the type of job an individual student desired could be related to the student's career decision and his values relating to work; the committee also wanted parental approval before the student was placed, so the card included a place for parent signature.

The committee approved the final registration form (Figure 11), the format being modified from the form being used by the Massachusetts Division of Employment Security. When the student receives the registration card he also receives a set of instructions (Figure 12). (In retrospect the form could probably have been improved by including a place for the student to state what kind of job he desired.)

The first year the use of the forms provided only marginal benefit and consequently they were not used extensively the second year. One of the schools originally had students return the registration forms to their counselor who then kept them. Occasionally the counselors reported an excellent counseling session when the student returned the registration forms relating to decisions to seek work or to obtain a different job. However, more often the actual situation was the student would hand the card to the counselor when he was busy or only had limited time and there was little opportunity for a counseling session.

Also, at this particular high school the decision was that counselors would not screen students for employers, but would only counsel students. This meant the registration cards would not be used as an aid in notifying appropriate students of job opportunities. Therefore, the responsibility for becoming aware of a job opening and applying for it was placed on the student. This was explained to the students, but it still caused some confusion. They thought they would be notified of jobs since they had put all the information on the registration forms and given them to their counselor. Consequently, the forms were not serving one of the original purposes of screening students or notifying them of openings.

The card of introduction and the specific employer information was available only through the school coordinator. If after talking with his counselor, however, a student knew he wanted a particular job listed on the bulletin, the counselor could call the coordinator and reserve a card of introduction for the student. The student could then pick up the card without being required to talk with the coordinator. This option proved useful. Now even though registration forms are not used between student and counselor in this high school, this option is still available. It seems to be used most often when the student is facing personal problems involving the need of money and has discussed this with the counselor.

The other high school principally used the registration card to check parental permission. The students returned the cards to their counselors who in turn gave them to the school coordinator. When the students requested a card of introduction the registration cards were checked to make sure one had been completed. Again, the cards were not used to notify students of job openings. For the second year in this high school, a much shorter form was devised that included student name, job desired and parental signature.

In retrospect, it appears that registration is useful for the student who is looking for a permanent full-time job. It is generally important to spend more time with this decision. The student who is looking for summer or part-time employment probably should not have to go through the same registration and counseling procedure, but it should be available on an optional basis.

This is basically the plan that is being used the second year. Students looking for permanent work are sought out in senior English classes and through counselors and are encouraged to register. The registration cards are filed according to type of job desired. These students are then notified when such a job becomes available. In addition, the usual notifications are placed on the bulletin board. This makes the placement information available to all students but does give additional help for the student who desires a permanent job.

In addition, the services of the Division of Employment Security are explained and these students are encouraged to take advantage of appropriate testing, counseling and placement services.

First Year Evaluation

During the first year the program had been in operation three months and this was preceeded by two months of organization, planning and establishing files. This involved a total expenditure of $4,800, including administrative time, one secretary working full-time and one secretary working full-time for eight weeks. This also included $250 for postage, printing and paper. During the second year it appeared that a secretary working only half time could do the required work. During the early fall and during the spring months the requirements are a little heavier, but during the winter months they are lighter because fewer jobs are being listed. These duties might be incorporated within those of the secretary responsible for issuing working papers or they might be in the duties of a secretary in the guidance office or the Career Resource Center discussed later in this document.

One school system has used student volunteers entirely to operate their program which does eliminate salary expenses. However, there is just one high school in that particular system, so their central placement office and school placement office are the same.

During the first three months of the program, 283 different job openings were received. This included openings for 556 different students. Of these, 150 were for permanent positions and 406 were for part-time and summer work. Since more than eighty percent of the high school graduates from this community take further schooling, a high percentage of summer positions was desired. The most frequent types of jobs listed included sales and counter work, clerical, industrial assembling and packaging, mechanical and shop work stock work and bus boy and waitress. However, there were at least some openings in almost all areas in which students could work.

A survey of those students registered for employment near the end of the school year indicated unanimous approval of the concept of a school-based job placement service. The most common adjectives used were excellent, very good, fine and a great idea. Some students offered suggestions for improvement. Unfortunately, these most often related to the realities of the job market which are difficult to change. The two most frequent complaints were that there was not enough variety in the job listings, and that there were not enough jobs for students under 16 years of age. Most jobs did fall within the areas listed in the previous paragraph, and although there was a wide variety in other areas there were not enough openings to satisfy the student demand. There were few steady jobs listed for students under 16 years of age. This was a result of several factors. One is the Massachusetts labor laws which prohibit underage employees from working after 6 p.m. and restrict them from doing certain kinds of work and from working in certain kinds of businesses. Another factor is that employers often prefer to employ the older individual and possibly one with some previous working experience.

Job Development

While the first year's activity had been mainly a collection of available jobs, the activity was expanded the second year to seek and find jobs to meet specific needs. During the first year and the early part of the second year these specific needs were: jobs for students in the special education program, both those who were graduating and those in their senior year who would be working a half day on a modified work-study program; half-day jobs during the school year for students in our recently expanded work-study program, primarily in clerical work and electro-mechanical devices; permanent jobs for graduates of the child-care work-study program; jobs for about fifty students from one junior high school; and numerous specific jobs to meet special needs of students referred by attendance personnel, counselors and psychologists.

Our first resource in all cases was the listing of jobs presently open. Another resource was the list of employers filed according to types of job for which they had hired students in the past. This list was initially developed from information taken from working paper applications, and additions were made as Jobs for Youth received job openings. These potential employers were called to see if they might possibly have a position available to meet the request. In most cases these two sources met the needs; however, several times this was not enough. For the girls in the child-care work-study program a special mailing was made to all of the hospitals in the metropolitan area describing our program and asking for permanent openings for high school graduates of such a program. This effort appears to be a success. Locating jobs for junior high school students under 16 is always going to be difficult, and that will be one of the major new activities the second spring.

As of this writing this activity has not been complete so no results can be reported. Several student leaders at one junior high made the request for jobs, so a solicitation similar to that done with the high school students the first spring is planned. One change will be that the students, provided with materials and some secretarial help, will do all of the organizational work. The business listings will basically come from the list of employers filed according to type of job. Each listing indicates if the student hired was under or over sixteen. The list of those employing students under 16 will be given to the students, and they will be asked to add others they might know of. Letters will be sent to employers and students will contact them about two weeks later. Based on experience with employers the previous year, it is difficult to be optimistic about locating a large number of jobs; but at least we will discover whether or not a concentrated effort can locate even a modest number of jobs for students of this age.

Follow-up studies have shown that over fifty percent of the graduates of this school system will be in professional jobs within seven years, and an even larger percent will be later. Entry level jobs of this type generally require a minimum of a college degree and often more is required. However, one of the justifications of this program has been to provide exploratory opportunities for students in various fields of interest. The decision was made to try one professional field on a limited basis the first year, to test the results. The field chosen was scientific research work, because there are many research laboratories in the metropolitan area and because there is much student interest in this area. Letters were written to about twenty laboratories. Of these, seven responded by letter. These seven were then contacted by telephone and two asked to interview students. Only one company actually hired for a summer job. Several of the companies indicated they had already done their summer hiring by the time we contacted them in late April. Based on this experience, it is not expected that a large number of students with just a high school background will be able to obtain summer jobs such as this; however, the second year a more determined effort with more student help is planned. The mailings are being done earlier, in February and March. All employers will be telephoned by a student as a follow-up of the mailing. It is hoped that these two efforts will increase the number of openings.

The one company who did cooperate the first year has proved to be very helpful. They will offer at least one position in their research laboratories each year to a high school student in this school system. They will provide speakers to student groups about careers or about research, and they have invited groups of students to tour their research and production facilities.

Exploring Student Job Motivation

When students come into the placement offices at the schools, generally they request a specific job listed on the bulletin. In discussing their choice, it is rather difficult for them to relate the series of decisions that had led them to that particular job choice. They can, however, give reasons for preference of a particular job over another. This involves a wide variety of reasons, quite often related to the type of work to be done. Jobs with definite vocational implications in professional fields are very quickly taken. Students looking for jobs tend to ask for work different from their previous employment. Transportation is a factor; those who have cars consider jobs regardless of location, while those dependent upon public transportation are more limited. Students mention money as a major reason for looking for work, yet it seems that in actual job selection the monetary consideration does not remain the major emphasis.

As another approach to determine students' motivation to work, a questionnaire was used with 70 consecutive students applying for working papers the last half of June. One of the questions was: What is the most important reason for choosing the job you took? Some gave more than one answer. The results are tabulated on Table 1.

Table 1. Survey of Students Applying for Working Papers: Reason for Job Choice

Reasons Given	Number
Money: many elaborated by saying to save for an education, to buy clothes, to be more independent	38
Experience: this included the experience of working an 8 hour day or the experience of doing this particular type of work	15
Something to do	13
Enjoy this particular type of job	9
Close to home or convenient to transportation	8
Good hours	7
Others (one each)	7

Money certainly is the most frequent reason for seeking a job. During the early summer, after school was closed but jobs were still available, many students came to the central placement office. Almost without exception, students say the reason they want to work is for money. However, as soon as they see that a variety of possibilities are available to them, the comparative amounts of money between different jobs is hardly mentioned and the emphasis is almost entirely on the type of work they might be doing.

This is particularly interesting, as before specific job openings are made known to students they are asked what type of work they want. They almost always reply they want anything, just as long as it is work. If pressed, they will sometimes arrive at a general field, but seldom are they able to verbalize a job with specific duties. This can be partly a function of looking unsuccessfully many places before finally arriving at the central office. By that time, they can be looking for anything as long as it's work, but as soon as choice becomes a reality, other criteria are used by the students.

Rationale for Job Placement Service

This relates to the original rationale for the establishment of the service. Many students were not having choices in job selection, and, therefore, were not evaluating the jobs they were selecting. Consequently, many were unhappy in their jobs. The resulting work was poor and many had short job tenure. The initial introduction to the world of work was unpleasant, and students were having difficulty in viewing, with any enthusiasm, their future in the working world. However, the provision of choice in job selection can alleviate many of these problems. First, it offers a sense of destiny, a sense of control over the future. Choice also allows a student to choose that which has the greatest cumulative appeal and sets the pattern of expectation and seeking of choices in future job decisions.

GUIDELINES FOR DEVELOPMENT OF JOB PLACEMENT SERVICES

The story of Newton's student placement efforts is the story of two years in one town. Each school system, each locale, each decade has its own distinct pattern and problems. No two placement efforts can ever be alike, as the variables of time and place and money and personnel are great. Each project must start, though, with a clear picture of the immediate situation.

Evaluation of Other Community Placement Activities

In initiating a school placement service, a first step is to determine what other placement-related activities are already in the community, and to examine their services. This analysis would include the group of employees and employers served, the completeness of the service, the nature of contacts with other groups in the community, and the extent to which these services would cooperate or compete with a school-based placement service.

This study should not just include placement services, but also the larger employers in the area and representative smaller employers. It should include information as to present employee procurement methods, satisfaction with these sources, and willingness to list appropriate vacancies with the school placement service. The present activities of the school need to be considered. Although a formal placement program may not be in operation, undoubtedly some type of vocational placement has been done.

From this combination of individual threads, the weaving of a vocational placement service can be started. The emotional investment and the interest in vocational placement of these people cannot be ignored. If professionally handled, many of their interests and energies can be channeled toward providing an improved service to high school-aged students. Their activities might be incorporated within the framework of the total program or they might provide ancillary services. It may be that with the establishment of a total school placement program their activities would no longer be required. Regardless of the final structure envisioned, initially these people need to be recognized and consulted on the development of the service.

Initial Approval and Organization of the Placement Service

In conjunction with the study of placement activities, approval, including financial approval, for a school-based vocational placement service needs to be obtained from appropriate administrative authorities in the school system. An advisory committee of school and community leaders is enormously helpful at this stage.

One of the initial policy decisions to be considered by the advisory committee would be the administrative organization of the placement service, whether it had best be centralized, decentralized or a combination of both.

In the centralized plan all placement is handled through one office or individual. In the decentralized plan staff members are usually responsible for placement of students in jobs related to their own areas of instruction. Each school within a system would be entirely responsible for its own program. A combination plan would vary with the size of the school system, but combines the features of both of the other plans and is similar to the Newton effort. If a centralized or a combination plan of organization is chosen by the committee, then the next task should be that of considering the position of the vocational placement coordinator. This will again vary with the size of the school. In a small school it could be assigned to someone as a collateral duty. In a larger school system it might include a director and a staff of several persons. The director should be given enough status so that he would be in close contact with administration as well as faculty. His ability to get things done quickly and to get school support for the implementation of the service is related to his position in the administrative hierarchy. Ideally, he should have had previous experience in both education and business, some of this being administrative in nature. His educational experience should have been related to guidance and vocational education as these are two with which the placement service will be most closely associated. Finally, he must be able to communicate effectively because his position will provide liaison between administration, instructional staff, counselors, students, employers, and former students who are working. Provision must also be made for sufficient secretarial help commensurate with the amount of work handled by the service, adequate office space and counseling rooms, and sufficient budget to carry out the duties assigned to the vocational placement service.

The advisory committee must also come to an early decision as to what type of placements will be arranged by the service. One consideration would be the type of individuals served. This might include students seeking part-time work, terminal graduates, dropouts, and alumni. A major consideration would be the original community need which led to the establishment of the placement service. Priorities must be established.

Relationship Between the Division of Employment Security and the School Vocational Placement Service

Another very important policy matter to consider is the relationship between the school placement service and other placement services, particularly the local Division of Employment Security. Generally, the closer these two agencies can work together the better the service provided to each student. An important consideration is related to the fact that placement is an integral part of vocational decision-making, and ideally should be the end product of counseling with the student's regular counselor. An added dimension of the counseling process is the information function. Both the school and the Division of Employment Security would have general occupational information and some specific local employment information. Under normal circumstances Employment Security would have more local job listings, while the schools would have a great deal more information about the student. Ideally, information should be freely exchanged between the agencies. The Employment Security Division can assist with testing for students undecided on a career. Often they can provide speakers for the schools to explain the labor market and the fundamentals of vocational choice. It must be remembered, however, that public employment agencies can be guided more in their placement by the job openings of the moment than by long-range needs of the client.

Public Relations and Community Surveys

The next step in establishing a placement service is two-pronged: informing the community, including both students and employers, and finding job openings.

Publicity directed toward the employers would include letters to all businesses in the community, talks before civic groups, radio and television programs, newspaper articles, and visits with prospective employers to explain the service. Perhaps one of the most effective devices for getting complete coverage in the business community, both for public relations and job openings, is through a community survey. A survey could contact every business in the community.

Publicity to the students could be through assemblies or home room meetings, bulletin board notices, and articles in the school newspaper. Additional publicity to students would result if they themselves were involved in the community survey for jobs, as they were in Newton.

Contact with school staff members needs first to occur with the inception of the idea and needs to continue through the planning and operation of the service. Their support, enthusiasm, and cooperation with the service is essential for its success.

The community survey of jobs can be an invaluable method for positive public relations and a means of obtaining information unavailable elsewhere. Before a survey is initiated, information already available should be assembled and a decision made as to whether the additional information acquired from a survey would be worth the time and expense involved. The advisory committee with the advice of the vocational placement coordinator should be instrumental in making this decision. The committee should realize the survey can be tremendously time-consuming and possibly expensive.

In starting a placement service connected with a counseling program, two broad categories of job information are needed. One would relate to jobs currently open, full-time or part-time; this information would be for students desiring immediate placement. The other category would relate to information about employment in the community and job trends covering entry level jobs and those requiring more experience and/or schooling; this material would help students weigh their vocational aspirations against the realities of the job market.

Groups in the community such as other departments in the school, Division of Employment Security, civic organizations, and their needs for this information, should also be considered before proceeding with the survey. These groups should be brought into the planning of the survey so that, if possible, information can be collected in such a form as to serve their purposes, too. The cooperation of these other groups can result in the sharing of expenses and work and in a broader base of community support for the survey. It is particularly important to design the survey so that information collected will be ample, yet not unwieldy.

Child Labor Regulations

Those working with the placement service need to be familiar with child labor laws. The basic purpose of these laws is to protect the health and well-being of youth and to make sure that their right to an education is not curtailed. Many of the provisions which restrict the employment of minors are included in the Fair Labor Standards Act. (1) States and municipalities may have additional requirements which will apply. Isaacson (2) has outlined some of the basic federal regulations, including minimum ages for normal employment, ages for various degrees of hazardous employment, and hours that minors can work. Knowledge of this information is essential to anyone placing minors on jobs. The School District of Philadelphia (3) has printed a leaflet for the use of employers, students, and counselors outlining pertinent labor regulations. Each placement service should outline regulations that apply in their community. A permit issued to minors allowing them to work is required in most states. The placement service may well be the issuing agency in the school system. If not, the placement service should work closely with the issuing department to interpret regulations to students.

Evaluation of Placement Activities

At least once a year, an analysis of placement activities needs to be conducted. This report should be sent to the school's administrative head and the director of pupil personnel services. It should also be distributed to the school staff and to the press. Any civic group that has been active in the program should receive a copy of the report and thanks for their help.

A follow-up of all students placed on the job in the form of an employer rating should be conducted periodically. This report should be discussed by the counselor and student. Asking students who have been placed by the placement service for their evaluation of the program and suggestions for improvements, would be another useful survey.

SUMMARY

INTRODUCTION

In order to gain an understanding of students in the context of their career development, it is necessary to be able to put them into some sort of perspective over time. Knowledge of the current activities of former students will give some indications of how present students are apt to develop along educational and vocational lines. Such information should not be used in a prescriptive way, but only for providing indicators to students about areas which they might explore.

Activities of former students may indicate areas where information is particularly in need of being included in the information services of the resource center. This would include indications about popular areas of activity, and about activities infrequently undertaken. In keeping with the theory that "alternatives which have not entered experience are, in fact, not alternatives at all," potentially rewarding areas of which students are apparently unaware might be identified through analysis of the activities of former students.

Regional trends in terms of school and college attendance after high school and types of occupations entered might be analysed through the use of follow-up information. Here again, popular areas would indicate a need for comprehensive information, and unpopular areas might indicate a need for expansion of awareness of alternatives.

This section is divided into two major sub-sections. The first sub-section presents steps in performing a follow-up study. It is intended as a guide to persons interested in instituting a follow-up study of former high school students. The second sub-section describes the Newton Follow-Up Program. It documents procedures developed in Newton, on the assumption that the reader will find it useful to learn how one particular follow-up program was organized. It is expected that the reader will adapt from these materials whatever he finds of practical use to him.

STEPS IN PERFORMING A FOLLOW-UP STUDY

This section presents suggestions for procedures to be used in performing a follow-up study. They are based upon the author's experience with the Newton Follow-Up Program and a search of the literature relating to the performance of follow-up studies. The suggestions are meant to be used as guidelines in organizing one's thoughts about the planning and execution of a follow-up study of former high school students.

Organize the Group of People Who Will Be Responsible for the Study

To be successful throughout all stages, and especially in the use of the results, a study should be planned so that many persons are involved in its planning and execution. Although one person or a small group will have to take major responsibility for coordination of the study, many people should be involved so that they feel that the study is planned with relevance to their needs. If this is done, they will have a genuine interest in the results of the study. Reporting on a review of 23 follow-up studies conducted in California, Dahl indicates that there is a tendency for follow-up studies to be done by one person, which is apt to be the greatest single factor limiting the effectiveness of their implementation and use. (1)

Numerous methods might be devised for involving people in the study. An advisory committee might be constituted with representatives of present students, former students, staff of the schools involved, administration, parents, and members of the community. A working committee of staff members and students could help in the administrative management of the study. Students in commercial courses could handle a great deal of the clerical detail as part of their course work.

Define the Objectives of the Study

The success of a follow-up study will depend largely upon how well its objectives are designed before the study is begun. The objectives should be stated as specifically as possible, so that specific procedures may be designed for reaching them. General objectives or purposes commonly include the collection of information for the evaluation and improvement of the school and the collection of information which will be useful to current and future students. In order to implement these general objectives, however, more specific objectives must be outlined.

Most follow-up studies of former high school students focus on educational and vocational experiences after leaving high school. The simplest objectives in these areas would be to identify the schools attended and the jobs held by the former students. Many schools collect this type of information within one year of graduation for each graduating class. Some studies will ask for comments and evaluation of the high school program, and possibly the guidance program specifically, which produces information of a qualitative nature in addition to the quantitative information. Many more levels of complexity can be added until a comprehensive program is developed, such as Newton's program, which is described in the next section.

Obviously, the specific objectives of the study will affect its scope. A school system just beginning a follow-up program would be best advised to limit its scope initially by defining a few very specific objectives. On the basis of the initial experiences, the program may be expanded in scope in subsequent studies.

The development of a follow-up program should be considered. A study might be a one-time project, or it might be part of an overall program. Such a program might call for periodic studies of a particular class, such as a one, three, and five year follow-up of each graduating class or of every third graduating class, or whatever suits the objectives of the program. A single study is apt to be an isolated project with limited usefulness, whereas a program of studies is more likely to represent a continuing process of evaluation and service.

Define the Population to be Studied

Depending on the objectives of the study, a class just out of high school or a class out of high school for several years might be chosen for study. Some studies will focus on graduates only, while others will focus on dropouts. Some studies might focus only on graduates of a particular program offered by the high school, particularly if it is a pilot program. Some studies will focus only on those who went on to higher education, while others will focus only on those who went to work full-time.

The size of the group to be studied will affect the target group for the study. If the group is relatively small, all members of the group may be included. If the group is large, a representative sample may be drawn. In either case, once the target group has been identified, there needs to be an effort to obtain responses from as many of the group as possible.

Design the Vehicle for Obtaining the Information

Most follow-up data are collected by questionnaire or by interview. Each method has its particular advantages and disadvantages, but since the questionnaire is usually more practical for school personnel, it is the method preferred by them.

Jackson and Rothney (2) did a study which compared the mailed questionnaire and the interview. They found that interviews resulted in more complete answers interviews resulted in more responses that gave clues to adjustments and problems, and each method resulted in some information about problems which were not discovered by the other method. In this study, about sixty dollars were spent on the interviews for every dollar spent on the mailed questionnaires. Thus, although the interview is a more sensitive information gathering technique, it is much more expensive.

A follow-up study might combine the two methods. Interviews by phone or in person might be sought with those who fail to respond after a reasonable time to a mailed questionnaire. If the reliability of the questionnaire is to be measured, or greater detail is desired from a sample of the respondents, the interview can be used with a representative sample.

Whichever method is used, the question items should be planned carefully to elicit the desired information with minimal bias. (3) The questionnaire should be kept as short as possible while still collecting the desired data. A long form may not be filled in at all, or the information may become less complete toward the end of the questionnaire. On the other hand, a short, post-card length questionnaire may run into trouble because of its small size and the tendency to confuse it with "junk mail".

Develop Procedures for Coding and Analysis of Data

Methods of handling the data should be anticipated ahead of time. If data processing equipment is available, codes will need to be developed to suit the requirements of data processing. If possible, certain codes might be printed on the questionnaire, and locations for codes to be written in later might also be printed on the questionnaire. This was done for the questionnaire used in the Newton Follow-Up Program, a sample of which appears in the next section.

Codes can be built on the basis of the expected responses. The number of digits in the code will be determined by the number of expected types of responses. A one-digit code will handle ten responses, a two-digit code will handle one hundred, a three-digit code one thousand, etc. Various levels of specificity can be built into a multiple-digit code, as was done with the Dictionary of Occupational Titles, where each digit adds another level of specificity.

Procedures for analysis of the data should be identified ahead of time. If data processing equipment is used, many statistical treatments of the data may be done quite easily provided that the data are collected and coded in such a way as to make this possible. The most basic way of presenting questionnaire data is with frequencies and percentages, as was done for the Newton Follow-Up Program. From this initial type of presentation, it might be decided to apply tests of significance to determine whether or not tendencies observed are likely to occur by chance.

Plan and Implement Procedures for Achieving an Acceptable Rate of Return

To avoid bias in the results, some technique should be planned for getting as close to a 100 percent return rate as possible. At some point it may be decided to follow up with phone calls to those who have not responded. Those not sending in the questionnaire after a phone call might be contacted for an interview by phone or at home. Another approach is the use of a registered letter, which insures the receipt of the questionnaire and dramatizes the importance of a reply. If the non-respondent group is too large, a random sample might be drawn and tracked down diligently, and then the results could be generalized as representative of all the non-respondents.

A study by Rothney and Mooren (4) analysed responses to a mailed post card. Four mailings and a home visit were necessary to gain the 100 percent rate of return. The first mailing brought a 56 percent return rate, the second raised the percent to 79, the third to 89, and the fourth to 95. The remaining five percent were contacted by a home visit. The authors kept track of who responded to each of the five contacts. They found general trends which would tend to bias results if a return rate of less than 100 percent were accepted. Their conclusions are:

> Subjects who have received intensive individual attention respond faster than those who have not.
> Subjects who have been interviewed frequently in a counseling program and those who have sought out further counseling respond more quickly than those who have not.
> Girls respond faster than boys.
> Subjects who rank highest in their graduating classes tend to respond faster than the lower ranking subjects.
> Subjects who score high on intelligence tests respond faster than the lower scoring students.
> Those subjects who are continuing education beyond high school respond more quickly than those who enter employment.
> Of employed subjects, those who are in the higher level

(4) J. W. M. Rothney and R. L. Mooren, "Sampling Problems in Follow-Up Research," Occupations, May, 1952, pp. 573-8 > jobs respond faster than the subjects who are unemployed or employed at unskilled jobs.

> Those students who report satisfaction with their post-school activity respond more quickly than those who are dissatisfied.
> Youth who had been uncertain about their vocational choice during the last month of senior high school did not reply as quickly as those who had indicated definite plans for post-school activity.
> Youth from broken homes tend to be slower in response than others.

Obviously, the only way to avoid bias would be to insure a 100 percent return rate from the original group included in the study. If that measure did not seem feasible, however, an alternative procedure would be to try to define the bias on the basis of available information about the total group. School records would probably yield data on sex, rank in class, and general ability. These three variables could be used to determine the characteristics of the non-respondents and whether or not they differ significantly from the respondents. Another procedure would be sampling the non-respondents, as mentioned above.

Some reasons for lack of response, discovered through phone contacts or home visits, have been:

> One subject had just been sentenced to a long jail term.
> Several were divorced and hesitated to report on or reveal their difficulties.
> One girl was attempting to hide so that she could not be served with legal papers.
> Several had been dropped from educational institutions and were antagonistic to all university personnel.
> Several, whose high school or university experiences had been unsatisfactory, were unwilling to cooperate with staff members from educational institutions.

> One boy had changed jobs so often that he thought the counselor would be disappointed in him if he reported those changes.
> One girl, who seemed to be partially employed at the most ancient but least honorable profession, would not answer mailed requests. (5)

It is generally believed that encouraging a positive attitude toward follow-up studies on the part of current students will increase their response to requests for information later on. If current students receive useful information gained from follow-up of former students, they may be more responsive to follow-up when it is their turn. If current students are asked to help in the organization and administration of a follow-up study, they may feel more loyalty to the process after leaving school. This technique would be suitable for a small school but it would reach only a very small percentage of the students in a large school. Even if a student could not be given any personal contact with a follow-up study or its results while in school, he could be told about the school's plans to contact him in the future. If the objectives of a follow-up study are explained to the student in terms of evaluation of the school, service to future students, and continued interest in him, he may have a more positive attitude about filling in a questionnaire. Having been led to anticipate the request for information, he may feel a certain responsibility to comply. All of this is conjecture, of course, since there has been no research on the matter. Lacking hard-nosed proof one way or the other, it would seem only common sense to prepare the student for follow-up while he is still in school.

(5) J. W. M. Rothney, Guidance Practices and Results, New York, Harper and Brothers, 1958, pp. 188-189.

Both Rothney (6) and Project TALENT contacted their subjects while in high school and, in effect, took out a contract with them to supply future information. Both studies emphasized this commitment during follow-up, with reasonably good results. Nonetheless, both studies still had to pursue fairly extensive measures to achieve the desired returns.

Another procedure which might result in greater responses to follow-up studies would be the maintainance of regular contact with alumni of the school. Problems with obtaining up-to-date addresses could be reduced by contacting all alumni each year whether or not they are included in a follow-up study. A newsletter about school events, perhaps including results from former follow-up studies, will maintain goodwill for the school and it will help maintain current addresses.

Beyond encouraging an identification with the study and a favorable attitude toward it, common sense would seem to indicate that an individual request for information would yield better results than just an impersonal, general request. Mooren and Rothney (7) tested this hypothesis by dividing their subjects into a personal and a general group. The general group received a form letter and a general questionnaire in all mailings. The personal group received a handwritten letter the first time, and a personal note on the form letter for each subsequent mailing. In addition, the personal group received questionnaires specifically relating to their after-school status, i.e. employed, in training, in the armed forces, married (girls only), or in farming. The authors found that the personal group responded slightly faster, but the difference was neither significant nor large enough to warrant the great amount of extra time and effort required for the personalized touch. They concluded that "there were no significant differences among the personal and general groups in terms of speed and quantity of response". (8)

Plan Procedures for Contacting the Subjects of the Study

Depending upon what has been decided, the former students will be contacted by phone or visit for a personal interview, or by mail with a questionnaire. If the interview technique is used, the interviewers will need to have decided upon the method of initial introduction, and just how they will present their request for information to maximize the possibility of cooperation. They will also need guidelines for conducting the interview in order to gain the desired information in a consistent way.

Since most follow-up studies are conducted by mailed questionnaire, the remainder of this section will treat various techniques relating to mailing.

There should be a cover letter sent each time a questionnaire is sent. This letter should come from the student's former school, on official stationery. Even if the study is to include more than one school, former students are more apt to respond if their link is with the former school rather than some central agency once removed from the school. The letter should mention the reasons for the study and point out that the students can be of help to future students by cooperating. The issue of confidentiality can be handled by pointing out that results will be reported in group terms only, if that is the case. Cover letters for subsequent mailings should cover the same points and stress the importance of obtaining complete returns for accurate results.

(8) Ibid., p. 412.

A thank you letter should be composed for sending to respondents. These might be sent each time a new mailing is made to non-respondents, or they might be sent in one group after the study has achieved its desired rate of return. Examples of cover letters and a thank you letter appear in the following section.

Project TALENT's experience (9) shows that rate of return seems to increase each time another copy of the questionnaire is sent. Reminder cards also seem to have a positive effect upon rate of return. Since people are apt to misplace forms, however, enclosure of another copy of the form is more likely to get results.

Use of a business reply envelope for questionnaire returns is convenient for the respondent and is economical over the long run, if the study is to involve three or four mailings. Most studies provide a return envelope with each copy of the questionnaire. Every live stamp not used is a loss in money to the study. With a business reply envelope, the study pays the post office only for each envelope actually used in the mails, and not at all for the envelopes which remain unused. Unless a 70 percent rate of return is achieved with the first mailing, which is unlikely, the business reply envelope will prove to be more economical than an envelope enclosed with live postage. The reply envelope can be one size smaller than the envelope used for the outgoing mailing. A number 9 envelope will fit inside the standard number 10 envelope, and it will still receive an 8 1/2 by 11 inch questionnaire folded twice.

Cooley, One-Year Follow-Up Studies, Project TALENT, Cooperative Research Project No. 2333, Pittsburgh, University of Pittsburgh, 1964. Chapter 2, "The Follow-Up Procedures," pp. 9-25.

Timing of the mailings can help obtain greater returns if, for example, forms are sent just before holiday periods when former students are more likely to be reached through their home addresses.

Plan the Presentation and Use of the Results of the Study

The use to be made of follow-up results will depend upon the objectives of the study. Typical objectives for follow-up studies of former high school students are:

a. To evaluate the effectiveness of the school in preparing students for future experiences.

b. To gain accurate, up-to-date information on the kinds of jobs and kinds of schools that students go on to.

c. To use the information for showing current students the kinds of alternatives available to them in their own educational and vocational planning. (This is far too infrequently done.)

d. To improve the curriculum by adding needed courses and/or eliminating outmoded courses, as indicated by the information collected.

e. To gather reactions of former students to their high school experiences.

f. To identify those former students in need of further help that the school might be able to offer them.

Most studies, of course, will focus on only a few specific objectives in order to keep the data collection job within reasonable limits.

When the data have been analysed, the information must get to people who have responsibility for action in areas where action may be indicated. In addition to counselors, teachers, administrators, and students themselves should be made aware of follow-up results and encouraged to use them. Graphic illustrations of follow-up results, such as summarizing charts and pictorial presentations, can have an effective impact. Case studies are useful for giving a personal touch and illustrating the dynamics involved in career development. If resources are available, movies of former students performing various occupational roles might be very effective.

Implement the Plans

After the above steps have been completed, the study has been defined sufficiently so that it can be put into operation. An overall time schedule for the preparation and planning of the study, the making of the contacts, the coding and analysis of the data, and the reporting of the results should be sketched out before the study is begun. The period of time involved will, of course, vary with the objectives of the study and its complexity. Various aspects of the performance of a study can only be defined and dealt with as the study is in progress. If the orientation is toward a follow-up program, however, each study performed will provide new experience upon which to base future refinements.

THE NEWTON FOLLOW-UP PROGRAM

Background

Prior to 1965, the Newton Public Schools had not gathered any follow-up information from its former students, with the exception of noting the fall activities of each graduating class. The program described here was developed to provide the first body of comprehensive information ever compiled about former students of the Newton high schools.

The program was begun in 1964-1965 by the Newton Public Schools, Division of Pupil Personnel Services and Special Education. On the basis of a trial study, plans for the program were finalized, and funds were sought from various agencies. Support was obtained from the Bureau of Vocational Education of the Department of Education of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts; the Ford Foundation grant to Newton for Technical, Vocational, and Adult Education; and the Harvard University - SUPRAD Committee on Pupil Personnel Services.

The program was planned to deal with comprehensive information because of anticipated involvement with a large-scale Harvard University Graduate School of Education project, "An Information System for Vocational Decisions," which was funded by the United States Office of Education. Plans were made to utilize the computer in analysis of the data, both for Newton's purposes and for those of the Information System for Vocational Decisions.

The major thrust of the Newton Follow-Up Program went into the performance of two studies. One dealt with a class out of high school for two years (the class of 1963) and one dealt with a class out of high school for seven years (the class of 1959). Dropouts (in Newton the dropout rate is low) were included in both studies. Comprehensive data of a sort never before available in Newton were presented as a result of these two studies. Major categories of information were: personal background information; educational history; occupational history; occupational choice factors; and evaluation of high school education.

In addition to the two comprehensive reports mentioned above, the program produced several related reports. A summary was made of follow-up data gathered each year over a thirteen year period by the Newton high schools, indicating the fall activities of the most recent graduating class. Another summary was made of data gathered each year by the Newton Technical High School on the activities of its five most recent graduating classes. A special report was developed to present the suggestions for improvement of the high school given by members of the class of 1959. Also, coding manuals were developed for each comprehensive study, to document all coding procedures used in each. The manual for the 1959 study represents a refinement of procedures developed for the earlier study.

The Newton program is atypical in terms of its objectives and procedures. Future follow-up studies in Newton will probably be done on a less elaborate scale, taking from the experience to date those approaches which best fit the current needs. The program developed as described in this section was meant to produce a continuing plan. Experience has shown, however, that follow-up studies in Newton will continue to evolve rather than settle on a fixed approach. Other school systems might be able to gain from Newton's experience by adapting those aspects most relevant to their local needs. Obviously, they would be best advised to design their own procedures on the basis of their own objectives and available resources.

Objectives

The objectives of the program were to collect comprehensive data on the educational and occupational experiences of former Newton high school students, plus their evaluation of their own high school experience, and to develop ways of feeding this information back to faculty and students so as to aid in the improvement of guidance, the curriculum, and the decision-making process of the students themselves. With such large-scale objectives, the program had to operate on a larger scale than would be feasible for most local school systems, including Newton, in the absence of outside support.

Two factors influencing the decision to base the program on such ambitious objectives were the lack of such information about former Newton students, and the anticipated involvement with the Harvard - U.S.O.E. project, "An Information System for Vocational Decisions". A further objective, related to involvement with the Harvard project but of interest to Newton as well, was the development of systems for relating follow-up data with data from the student cumulative record. It was hoped that through this program Newton could make a start toward having a fully functioning system for longitudinal study of students, both throughout their careers within the school system and after leaving school. To this end it was planned to develop coding systems and systems of handling and storing data which could be standardized for use with a computerized approach to student records and follow-up data.

Target Populations

Because comprehensive data on educational and vocational experiences was desired from the studies, it was decided that the classes to be contacted should have been out of high school for a sufficient amount of time for them to have had a reasonable amount of intervening experiences. The first class to be studied, the class of 1963, was followed up in the spring of 1965, roughly two years after graduation. This class was chosen because its time of leaving high school was still relatively recent, and its impressions of the high school program would still be somewhat fresh. The second class to be studied comprehensively was the class of 1959. It was followed up in the spring of 1966, roughly seven years after graduation. This class was chosen because it was felt that seven years was sufficient time for the respondents to have had many intervening experiences and to be settling into a somewhat stable pattern.

As would be expected, the response rate (68 percent) was higher for the class which had been out of school for only two years. The class out of high school for seven years was more difficult to contact. Its overall response rate was 49.9 percent. Adjusting for the 19 percent of the class who could not be reached for lack of usable addresses, the overall response rate for those who were actually contacted was 61.5 percent.

Some bias was evident in each study in favor of those who stood high on class rank and who were in the highest academic curriculum. Graduates had a higher rate of response than dropouts, and girls showed a slight tendency to respond more than boys. Surprisingly, in the class of 1959, very little bias in response was evident on the basis of intelligence quotient.

The Questionnaire

The questionnaire used in the Newton Follow-Up Program has evolved through two revisions to its current form (Figure 1). Its design was based upon a questionnaire developed for the 1939-1941 Occupational Adjustment Study directed by Dr. Edward Landy for the National Association of Secondary School Principals. (10)

The lines at either side of the heading on the front page are for the recording of information by secretaries when the form is returned. Codes for the particular high school, the particular class, sex, and the phase of mailing responded to (i.e. first, second, or third) are entered here.

The form is organized into areas according to page sequence. Page one asks for personal background information and current educational and employment status. Page two asks for information about the educational history. Page three relates to the occupational history and occupational adjustment. Page four asks for information about occupational planning (occupational choice factors) and evaluation of high school education. Figure 2 presents a listing of the various items of the questionnaire and the categories to which they relate.

Permanent mailing address is requested to avoid temporary addresses such as college or summer addresses.

An attempt was made to write instructions as clearly and concisely as possible, while making them as complete and specific as possible. Although

10. What REGULAR jobs have you held since you left high school, including your present job, if any?

NOTE: By regular, we mean jobs which were half-time or more, and which were not just temporary such as snow-shoveling, etc. Omit summer jobs and jobs which were only seasonal.

Fill in the following information for each regular job you have held since you left high school. Omit jobs held while still in high school, but be sure to include your first job held after leaving high school.

If you have held more than six jobs, note those at which you worked the longest time. Be as complete as possible. Include service in the armed forces. START WITH YOUR PRESENT JOB AND WORK BACK.

Name and address of employer	Kind of business	Name of job or kind of work	Dates	Full- or Part-time	Reason for leaving
EXAMPLE: Clover Stores Co. 333 So. Main St. Newton, Mass.	Retail Grocery	Sales clerk	From: Mar. 1963 To: Sept. 1964	1 ☒ Full-time 2 ☐ Part-time	Offered better job
Present Job:			From: To:	1 ☐ Full-time 2 ☐ Part-time	Present job is the .... job (indicate number such as 3rd, 6th, etc.).
			From: To:	1 ☐ Full-time 2 ☐ Part-time
			From: To:	1 ☐ Full-time 2 ☐ Part-time
			From: To:	1 ☐ Full-time 2 ☐ Part-time
			From: To:	1 ☐ Full-time 2 ☐ Part-time
			From: To:	1 ☐ Full-time 2 ☐ Part-time

NOTE: If you do not have a job at present, skip items 11 to 18 and go directly to item 19.

11. Did your employer put you through a period of training when you first started working on your present job?

1 ☐ Yes. For how long? ....

(Describe) ....

2 ☐ No

12. What are your present average annual earnings before deductions? .... ________

(Include extras such as tips, commissions, bonuses, etc.)

13. Are you employed by a member of your family, or by a friend of your family, or by a relative?

1 ☐ Yes (Explain) ....

2 ☐ No

14. Through what source did you learn about the "opening" that led to your present job?

(Check "X" one)

1 ☐ Member of your family, a friend or relative
2 ☐ School authorities
3 ☐ Private employment agency (to whom you paid a fee)
4 ☐ Public employment agency (such as State Employment Service)
5 ☐ Personal application while looking for a job
6 ☐ Classified advertisement in paper
7 ☐ Other (Explain) ....

15. To what degree is your present job related to your studies in HIGH SCHOOL?

1 ☐ Closely related
2 ☐ Somewhat related
3 ☐ No relationship
4 ☐ Can't rate this

16. To what degree is your present job related to your studies in a SCHOOL AFTER HIGH SCHOOL?

1 ☐ Closely related
2 ☐ Somewhat related
3 ☐ No relationship
4 ☐ Can't rate this

17. How do you feel about your present type of work?

4 ☐ Very satisfied with it
3 ☐ Fairly satisfied with it
2 ☐ Neither satisfied nor dissatisfied
1 ☐ Rather dissatisfied with it
0 ☐ Very dissatisfied with it

18. Do you plan to remain on this job for at least another year?

1 ☐ Yes
2 ☐ No. I would like to change jobs, but continue to do the same type of work.
3 ☐ No. I would like to get a job in the same field, but at a more advanced level.
4 ☐ No. I would like to get a job in a different field.

19. In what employment or placement agencies are you now registered, if any?

(If not registered in any agency, write "none.")

(1) Name ....

Address ....

(2) Name ....

Address ....

20. What do you expect is going to be your regular occupation?

....

(Be specific, as airplane mechanic or airplane pilot, not aviation; typist, stenographer, private secretary, not clerical. If military service, specify type of work. If you are still undecided, write "undecided" here.)

21. When did you decide definitely on what you now expect is going to be your regular occupation?

(Check "X" one)

0 ☐ Still undecided
1 ☐ Before entering Senior High School
2 ☐ During Senior High School
3 ☐ Since leaving high school and prior to present job
4 ☐ While on present job
5 ☐ While attending post high school educational institution
6 ☐ Other (Explain) ....

22. Have any of your hobbies had a relation to your vocational choice?

1 ☐ Yes (Explain) ....
2 ☐ No

NOTE: For questions 23 through 26:

By "occupational life" is meant everything to do with getting jobs, doing the work required on those jobs, deciding and planning for a life's work, and actually carrying out the plans for life's work.

23. What person at high school, if anyone, helped you most with your occupational life? (Give person's position.)

....

24. From what sources chiefly have you sought advice about your occupational life since leaving school?

(Check "X" those which have been of MOST help to you)

0 ☐ No one
1 ☐ Public School officials
2 ☐ A school attended since leaving high school
3 ☐ YMCA, YWCA, and similar sources
4 ☐ Public employment agency
5 ☐ Private employment agency
6 ☐ Parents, relatives, or adult friends of the family
7 ☐ Workers on jobs you are interested in
8 ☐ Employer or supervisor
9 ☐ Immediate personal friend
10 ☐ Religious Counselor
11 ☐ Other (Explain) ....

25. Which subject that you took in high school has been of most value to you in your occupational life since you left high school?

(If no subject has been of value to you, write "none" here.)

26. What subjects or kinds of education which you DID NOT HAVE do you now think would have helped you in your occupational life since leaving school?

27. If there are any suggestions you care to make which might help the school be of greater service to you or the young people now in the school, please write them here.

28. Why did you leave high school?

1 ☐ Graduated
2 ☐ Other (Explain) ....

NOTE: Will you kindly check over the questions to make sure that you have indicated or written an answer for each question. Be sure that your name, address, phone number, and the date this blank was filled in are written clearly on the top of the first page.

PLEASE RETURN THIS INVENTORY FORM IN THE ENCLOSED ENVELOPE AT ONCE. THANK YOU.

instructions are extensive in places, such as items 5 and 10, the respondents seemed to have very little difficulty in following them.

Numbers and lines in the margins throughout the questionnaire are for coding purposes when the form has been returned. Clerical assistants circle the proper number in numbered items and write in the proper code where the code is more complicated. This simplifies the process of transferring the data to cards or sheets for data processing input.

Experience with the current form has indicated the possibility of some minor changes for a future revision:

Item 1: (Employment status)

- a. An explanatory note should indicate that the appropriate choice for a person attending school and not working would be option 5 (unemployed and not seeking work).
- b. The value of separating options 6 and 7 (taking compulsory military training vs. serving a regular enlistment) is debatable. The two might be combined into a single option, such as "serving as a member of the armed forces of the U.S."

Item 6 (expected major when graduated from high school): This item might be eliminated, unless specific plans are made to analyse the change in majors from the expected major to the final major. Item 7 (final major) provides sufficient information otherwise.

Item 19 (registration with employment agencies): This item seems to be of relatively little value. Thus it might be eliminated in the interest of shortening the form.

Item 22 (relation of hobbies to vocational choice): This item seems to be of relatively little value and might be eliminated.

Item 25 (subject of most value): The responses to this item proved difficult to code, and the results were difficult to interpret. Consequently, the item seems to be of little use, and it might be removed.

Coding

Wherever possible, codes were indicated on the questionnaire next to the options of the easily coded items. In many cases, however, it was not practical to indicate the code on the questionnaire. Thus a supplementary coding manual had to be developed to guide the secretaries who did the coding. In all cases, codes determined by the secretaries were written on the questionnaire on the lines specified for each code.

One-digit or two-digit codes were developed for the following items of information, some of which were taken from the student cumulative record, rather than the questionnaire:

- Type of program in a school after high school
- Length of time attended a school after high school
- Type of attendance (i.e. full-time, part-time, or a combination)
- Reason for leaving a school after high school
- Degree or diploma earned at a school after high school
- College major
- Person at high school who helped most with occupational life
- Reason for leaving a job
- High school subject most valuable in occupational life
- Subjects suggested which would have been helpful in occupational life
- Type of suggestion for improvement of the high school
- Feeling tone apparant in suggestions
- Overall adjustment - occupational and educational
- College Entrance Examination Board achievement scores
- High school curriculum
- Rank in class
- Reason for leaving high school
- Marks
- English, Language, History, and Science curriculum
- Foreign language
- Type of mathematics
- Shop (for Technical High School only)
- Relation of job to course of study (for Technical High School only)

A more complicated code was developed for the schools and colleges that the respondents had attended. This code is a seven digit code, made up of sub-codes. The first digit stands for type of school or college (i.e. four-year degree granting, two-year degree granting, nursing program, other specialized programs, and preparatory schools). The second digit stands for region of the United States (i.e. New England, Middle Atlantic, Mid-western, etc.). The third, fourth, and fifth digits represent a three-digit number that is unique for each school or college. The numerical order of these numbers places the schools and colleges in alphabetical order within type. The sixth and seventh digits stand for division or program within the school or college (e.g. accounting, agriculture, airline stewardess, architecture, etc.). This two-digit code places the various divisions or programs within both numerical and alphabetical order. The complete seven-digit code is unique for each school or college because of the third, fourth, and fifth digits. The sub-codes make it possible to sort the schools attended on the basis of the various factors making up the code.

Two existing codes developed by the United States Government were also used for this study. The Standard Industrial Classifications were used to code kinds of businesses indicated in item 10 (occupational history). The code appears in the Standard Industrial Classification Manual, Executive Office of the President, Bureau of the Budget, 1957. The secretaries of the project found the manual very easy to use because of the alphabetical indices in the back which resolved most questionable coding situations. No additional codes had to be created for our purposes.

The 1965 edition of the Dictionary of Occupational Titles, third edition, Volume I, Definitions of Titles, U.S. Department of Labor, was used for coding all occupations in the '59 study (questionnaire items 3, 4, 10, and 20). Although the D.O.T. code is a six-digit code, only the first three digits were used for purposes of this study. Each of the three digits indicates a different level of specificity. The reader is referred to the D.O.T. for the complete listings of the codes.

Figure 3 presents some three-digit codes used in the '59 study which deserve special note. Because our respondents did not always provide enough information to classify an occupation under existing codes of the D.O.T., a few codes were created for occupational descriptions which occurred often enough to merit a code. New codes created are marked on Figure 3 with a number sign (#). They are Foreman, Housewife, Laborer, and Owner. These are responses which occurred often enough to warrant the creation of a special code. A few other responses which were uncodable using the D.O.T., but which did not occur often enough to warrant a special code, were coded as unclassifiable.

* Code used for '59 study differs from that used for '63 study

This code was created for use in our studies

Some codes used in the '59 study differ from those used in the '63 study for the same occupational titles. The difference is due to the fact that the coding for the '63 study was done before a complete copy of the 1965 D.O.T. was available. The coding for the '63 study was done from an advance copy of the classifications, without the benefit of the cross-referencing and definitions provided by the complete dictionary. Thus, when the final copy of the 1965 D.O.T. became available, it was possible to classify more accurately specific occupations. Occupations whose '59 codes differ from the '63 codes are marked with an asterisk (*).

Other occupations which appear in Figure 3 are ones for which some ambiguity in coding is apt to exist. In order to maintain consistency for those potentially ambiguous responses, a record was kept so that the same code would be used each time the response occurred. A few of the codes might represent ones which were difficult to track down to a specific code, and a record was kept to avoid the necessity of another time-consuming search if the response were to occur again.

As a general rule, the coders tracked each occupational title through the D.O.T. as far as possible to determine a specific code. In many cases where enough information was given to classify the occupation in a general area, the code ending in 9 (not elsewhere classified) was used.

Some occupations listed in Figure 3 appear in order to illustrate the differentiation between occupations with similar titles but important distinctions. Examples are housekeeper vs. housemother, and practical nurse vs. practical nurse, licensed.

After all codes had been identified and entered on the questionnaire in the appropriate locations, all codes were transferred to mark-sense data processing cards. Eleven different cards were used for each student in the study of the class of 1959. Six cards contained information from the questionnaire, and five cards contained information from the student record. The standard mark-sense card used allowed the entry of 27 columns of new data into each card. In addition, the first 14 columns of all mark-sense cards were pre-punched so that all cards for each student would contain the same information. This information was punched into all mark-sense cards from the basic student information cards. The student identification number was assigned by the project secretaries after they identified the students to be included in the study. They then punched up the standard basic student information cards, from which all other cards were prepared. These standard cards were also used to print address labels.

Although the use of mark-sense cards is preferable to hand keypunching of cards, the use of optical scanning sheets is preferable to the use of mark-sense cards because much more information can be entered on one document, and the document can be designed to suit specific needs.

One of the card formats used in the '59 study appears as Figure 4. The items of information standard to all cards for each student appear in columns 1-9. Columns 15 to 41 contain the 27 columns of mark-sensed data. This particular card contains the responses to items 1 to 4, 6, 7, 20, and the first school listed in item 5 of the questionnaire. The coding for each item is indicated, referring the coder to the proper code sheets in the manual where necessary. The phrase "item code" means that the code appears under the item on the questionnaire. As much as possible, data were entered into the cards in the same order as the items of the questionnaire. In order to use all available space, however, items were occasionally entered out of order. Hence the appearance of item 20 on the same card as items 1 to 7.

This discussion of coding procedures is necessarily incomplete, but it is intended to give a brief overview. Specific codes and procedures are completely described in the coding manual for the study of the class of 1959. (12)

Mailing Procedures

A schedule of mailing of the questionnaires was worked out on a three week cycle. Rather than to send reminder cards, it was decided to send another copy of the questionnaire every three weeks to the persons who had not yet responded. Cover letters were written to accompany each mailing (Figures 6, 7, and 8). They were sent from the high school which the students had attended, rather than from the project office, in order to capitalize on school loyalty. Each letter mentions the facts that the results will be helpful to future students, the information will be treated confidentially and

Spring, 1966

To the Members of the Class of 1959 at Newton High School:

We are interested in finding out about your experiences since you left high school. We would like to know whether you continued along the paths that you started on immediately when you left the school, or whether your plans and objectives have changed. This information will not only keep us up to date as far as you are concerned, but will enable us to improve our program and guidance for future students.

By filling out the enclosed Post-School Inventory you will be helping those who follow you as graduates of NHS. Naturally we will treat all of this information confidentially and since it will be used for group reports only, you will not be individually identified.

We have enclosed a business reply envelope to help you return this to us after you have filled it in. We thank you in advance for taking the time necessary to do this and for cooperating with us in making this project successful.

Best wishes to you from all of us at NHS.

Sincerely yours,

Richard W. Mechem
Principal

Dear Former Student:

Perhaps you have misplaced the questionnaire which we sent to you a few weeks ago, or you may have found it difficult to take the time to fill it out. We would appreciate your doing this soon, since we are very anxious to obtain information to help us evaluate and improve our school programs.

Your participation in this study is very important. We need answers from all the members of your class to be sure our results are accurate. Information which you supply will be kept confidential and will be used for group reports only. It will be of help to us in improving our programs for the benefit of present and future students at Newton High.

For your convenience we are enclosing another copy of the Post-School Inventory plus a business reply envelope. Please return it to us as soon as you can.

Thanks and best wishes.

Sincerely yours,

Richard W. Mechem
Principal

Dear Former Student:

We have had a very good response to our questionnaire. In order to make our results more accurate and more meaningful, however, we are all the more anxious to hear from you. The information which you provide will be helpful to present and future students at Newton High School.

We realize that you are busy and find it difficult to take time to fill out the questionnaire. Nonetheless, we hope you will do it soon, since your participation in the study is very important.

As we have mentioned before, your replies will be kept confidential and used for group reports only.

For your convenience, we are enclosing another copy of the Post-School Inventory plus a business reply envelope. We look forward to hearing from you soon.

If you have already filled in and returned the questionnaire, it has probably crossed in the mails with this request. In that event, there will be no need for you to fill in the questionnaire again.

Thank you for your help.

Sincerely yours,

Richard W. Mechem
Principal

will be used for group reports only, and the business reply envelope will make the return mailing convenient. Each successive letter is a bit more forceful in its request for cooperation. Each time another mailing was sent, a new cover letter and another copy of the questionnaire with another business reply envelope were included.

As returns came in, the project secretaries kept careful records of the respondents and the questionnaires returned due to invalid addresses, and sent appropriate thank you letters (Figure 9). Some attempt was made to obtain valid addresses for the questionnaires returned by the post office, but this was very difficult.

Rate of Response

The rates of response in percentages for the study of the class of 1963 were as follows:

Sex	Newton South High School	Newton High School	Both Schools
Boys	71	63	66
Girls	70	69	69
Both	70	66	68

The total number of former students in the study was 1078, of whom 729 (68 percent) responded. As can be seen in the chart, one school had a slightly higher rate of response than the other. Girls tended to respond slightly more than boys at one school. Persons with a high rank in class showed a higher rate of response, as did persons who were in the highest academic curriculum in high school. Graduates tended to respond at a higher rate than dropouts.

The rates of response for the study of the class of 1959 appear in

Dear Former Student:

Thank you very much for your cooperation with us in returning the questionnaire which we sent to you recently. By providing the information requested, you have aided us in our attempt to evaluate and improve our school programs. Your continued interest in and support of Newton High School is much appreciated.

All best wishes.

Figure 10, which is excerpted from the report of the 1959 study. (13) Of the 954 persons included in the study, 472, or 49.5 percent, responded with information. When the 18.9 percent who could not be contacted are removed from consideration, the response rate for those contacted becomes 61.5 percent. Although these rates are below the desirable percentages for analysis of results, they seem reasonable in terms of the length of time the class had been out of high school (seven years) and the length of the questionnaire.

Presentation of Results

Figures 11 through 16 present some selected tables from the study of the class of 1959. These tables are presented to illustrate the format in which data were reported for the study of the class of 1959. In keeping with the comprehensive objectives of the study, data were reported as completely as possible. Each table reports information by school, sex, and totals, with both numbers and percentages. Because percentages are based only on those who responded to each item, the number and percentages of respondents who left the item blank are presented at the bottom of the table to put the responses to the particular item into perspective with the total number of questionnaire respondents. The notes which accompany these selected tables in the '59 report are reproduced as Figure 17. The notes are meant to highlight some of the trends indicated by data in the tables.

These tables and notes are presented simply as examples of the method used to report results for the Newton Follow-Up Program. It is not implied that the reader should follow these examples. On the contrary, it is

Seven years after leaving high school, 73.0% of our respondents were not going to school, and 27.0% were. Only 12.0%, however, were attending school full-time. Of these, two-thirds were boys. Another 12.0%, not going to school, were receiving training on the job. Three-fourths of these were boys. More Tech High boys than Newton High boys were working, and more girls were working than both groups of boys combined.

66.0% of our respondents had earned a bachelor's degree, and another 12.0% were working on one. 11.0% had earned a graduate degree, and another 26.0% were working on one. More boys than girls had earned a bachelor's degree, and, conversely, more girls than boys had earned an associate degree. 17.0% had earned a specialized diploma or certificate, three-fourths of these being girls. At the graduate level, more girls than boys had earned a master's degree (probably girls in the education field), but more boys than girls were working on master's and doctoral degrees. The percentages of degrees earned or being worked on add up to more than 100% because some people earned more than one.

Page 2 of Figure 12 shows the number of degrees or diplomas earned by individuals. 69.0% of our respondents had received at least one degree or diploma, with boys and girls about the same. About 11.0% were working on a degree or diploma with slightly more boys than girls in the category. That leaves 20.0% who had not earned or not worked on a degree or diploma.

Of the Tech High respondents, 8, or about 19.0%, had earned a degree or diploma. Four, or 9.5%, were working on a degree or diploma. That leaves 30, or about 71.0%, who had not earned or worked on a degree or diploma.

Over half of our respondents, an overall total of 56.5%, are employed full-time. Part-time employment accounts for only 5.9%. An overall total of 20.6% are in the category of doing housework at home and not otherwise employed. Analysis of this overall figure shows that these respondents are all former Newton High girls; and the percentage of Newton High girls who used this category is 40.8%. This is what we would expect, and for these respondents being a mother and homemaker is a full-time occupation.

The percentage of those unemployed and seeking work is extremely low - 1.1%. Those taking compulsory military training or serving a regular enlistment account for 3.8% of our respondents. We also find 0.6% serving in a voluntary program such as the Peace Corps.

The category unemployed and not seeking work was used by 10.6% of our respondents, none of whom were from Tech High. Analysis of this category showed that 20.4% of Newton High boys compared to only 4.6% of Newton High girls checked this. For some of these respondents, further schooling may account for use of this category.

Figure 14. Source of Opening that Led to Present Job

Although the family seems to be the leading source of help for finding employment as indicated, the personal initiative of the student was the next highest source. School authorities (probably of a school after high school) played a lesser role, and employment agencies - both public and private - were least significant. These results parallel the response from the class of '63, with the exception that personal application is a more significant factor for the class of '59, which has been on the job market for a longer period of time.

301 or more than 63.0% in the class of 1959 responded to this item. Of those, 90.0% expressed some degree of satisfaction with their present job. 65.0% stated that they were very satisfied, with 25.0% responding in the fairly satisfied category. Newton High boys expressed a higher degree of satisfaction with 70.0% stating that they were very satisfied compared to 56.0% of the Tech High boys.

Seven years after graduation one-tenth of the respondents were still undecided about their vocational choices. Of these, more Newton High boys tended to be undecided. Ten percent had decided on their expected occupation before high school. About one-fourth had decided on their expected occupations before leaving high school. More than one-fourth decided after high school either before or during employment. One-fourth decided on their expected occupations while attending a post high school educational institution.

suggested that the reader devise his own methods of reporting which should be less comprehensive than the tables sampled here. The comprehensiveness of these tables presents the data accurately and completely, but it may discourage all but the most highly motivated interpreter of the results. In order to convey easily and clearly some of the most important findings, it would have been better to develop new tables illustrating the highlights of the data, and perhaps using only percentages, along the lines of the chart presented at the beginning of the previous sub-section (Rate of Response). On the other hand, because the data are reported completely in the form illustrated by the selected tables and notes, a person wishing to answer a specific question by consulting the report will have a good chance of finding the specific data which he is seeking. Thus, the comprehensive type of report illustrated here is meant to serve as a reference rather than a summarized overview.

Another method of presenting results is illustrated in Figures 18 through 21. These career charts present the development of former students toward their goals over the seven years after leaving high school. They were drawn up from questionnaires returned in the '59 study. Names were changed and information was disguised somewhat to protect the identities of the individuals.

Prior to the institution of the comprehensive follow-up program discussed herein, the Newton high schools had each year collected information in the fall about the activities of the most recent graduating class. As part of the Newton Follow-Up Program, the results from these studies over a thirteen year period were presented in a summary report. One page of that report appears as Figure 22. This page illustrates the various categories and sub-categories used, a major distinction being drawn between those pursuing further education and those not involved in education. Several categories appearing on this table have no percentages in them but appear here in order to maintain uniformity with Newton High School, which did use these categories. One category will not be used in the future. Because Massachusetts has transformed its former teachers' colleges into liberal arts institutions, it will no longer be appropriate to retain teachers' colleges as a separate category. Because only one page of the report appears here, it is difficult to illustrate the usefulness of this data as it makes possible comparison between the two Newton high schools, one of which graduated its first class in 1961, and the other of which has a history of more than one hundred years. A similar page for Newton High School made possible direct comparison between the two schools over the years 1961 to 1966.

Figures 23 and 24 present a sample cover letter and questionnaire of the sort used to gather the type of information on the fall activities of the most recent graduating class illustrated in Figure 22.

SUMMARY

This section has presented guidelines for performing a follow-up study and a description of the Newton Follow-Up Program. The reader is reminded that these materials are meant for general use rather than specific application. A successful follow-up program can be implemented only on the basis of locally oriented objectives. If this section has served to provide some ideas about ways of creating a viable follow-up program in the reader's own area, it will have served its purpose.

Dear Graduate of Class of 1967:

We would appreciate it greatly if you took a few minutes of your time to fill out the attached questionnaire. In most cases, it will be necessary to fill out just one of items I-VI. We are particularly interested in your responses to item X and we hope you will be as specific as possible.

To facilitate matters, we are enclosing a stamped return envelope. If at all possible, we would appreciate hearing from you before Dec. 30, 1967. At that time we must submit a report to the Superintendent of Schools on your present whereabouts.

Our best wishes for a successful 1968.

Sincerely,

Margaret E. Addis

Using the Integrated Career Information Service

Three months before this document was written, the Career Information Library and the Jobs for Youth Placement Service were combined to form the Career Guidance Resource Center. This was established at Newton High School as a part of the guidance program under the supervision of the head of the guidance department.

Ideally, the career resource center should be located near the high school library and the audio-visual equipment center so that there is one central area in the school for getting information and the equipment for its use. It is important to have a close working relationship among the three services so that their activities and resources will supplement and not compete with each other.

For optimum functioning, a career resource center should have three rooms: one containing the library and a reception desk for the secretary-library aide, an office for the professional staff member for consultations with students, and a room containing audio-visual equipment where students and counselors may look at sound filmstrips, listen to tapes and so on. This third room could also be equipped and used for group guidance, counselor discussions , or career conferences with community representatives.

Besides the library services and placement functions, the career resource center provides three additional services related to careers in the high school: a dissemination service, extensive guidance services, and a community liaison service. These will be described in detail later in this section.

Because most of these services require a professional person trained in vocational guidance, it was decided that the career center definitely should be a function of the guidance department rather than a library function.

In addition, students had indicated that the "no-talking" atmosphere of a library did not appeal to them. The career center can provide an attractive, friendly and permissive place where students feel free to talk and to explore if it is operated more as a helping center than as a library.

On the other hand, as a close relationship of mutual help and cooperation with the high school library seemed important, the career resource center modeled most of its circulation procedures and processing of books on established library procedures. The classification of the career library according to the Dictionary of Occupational Titles was retained, and has proved to be efficient and convenient.

The decision was made, on a trial basis, that the center would not exact fines for late books, the rationale being that the center's function is primarily guidance and that it is preferable to establish a feeling of trust and confidence in interactions with students rather than to worry them over the loss of relatively inexpensive, quickly outdated materials. At this writing, the center has experienced no difficulty in loss of materials because of this decision.

When the career information library was moved to the high school, it was staffed by one professional person trained in vocational guidance and also trained in library procedures and one full-time secretary-library aide. The new career resource center began immediately to function as a circulating library providing vocationally related information to students and faculty at the high school. Consultation with students about careers and giving job introductions to students became a function of center personnel. As a response to articulated needs and desires of counselors and teachers in relation to career guidance within the high school, the staff began developing a series of guidance services and community contacts.

Because of inadequate space in the high school, career center activities were not as centralized the first year as they should have been. In this situation, the center had to function in a section of one large room, having no office space and no space for consultation or for use of audio-visual equipment. Consequently, activities were decentralized, as in the use of student lounges, and consultation at the center was de-emphasized. In many high schools, a lack of ideal amounts of space will probably be a reality making the mode of operation described below more realistic than idealistic. On the other hand, a separate office for the professional staff person, which can be used for consultation, is a necessity for meaningful operation of this kind of center.

Activities and services of a career center may be modified according to the needs and size of the school. Amount of personnel to staff a center would also depend on how extensive a program was to be attempted. Both from a practical, financial point-of-view and from a guidance point-of-view, use of student aides and student committees is helpful. Certainly some of the library-aide functions and many planning functions could be done by students.

Library Services

A first responsibility of the career resource center was to continue to accession, classify, and store occupational and occupationally related materials. Although, in the initial development of the library, all available occupational materials were accessioned without specific evaluation, new materials are evaluated with respect to reading levels, usefulness for the particular clientele, quality of content and cost. This will be discussed further in the section on evaluation.

Although the occupational information library does not collect and store college catalogs, use of the library with students has indicated a need for a collection of catalogs of technical and vocational schools and post-high training centers (particularly training opportunities in the immediate community) other than colleges or junior colleges. Student requests also have indicated a need for information about available on-the-job training opportunities locally and in large industries in other communities. This collection has been started. Because college catalogs have traditionally been stored in the high school library, future plans for the school include the expectation that educational and vocational information will be kept in the same area and that the school library, the career center and audio-visual aids will be available in a comprehensive information area.

Occupational information in the center consists of reading materials: books, hard cover pamphlets, paper pamphlets and, in addition to classified materials, assorted free materials and posters. Records, tapes, and sound filmstrips are also available. Some explanation of how these materials are used may be helpful to those considering a library.

An excellent collection of up-to-date-professional books in the field of career development and career guidance has been accumulated. So far, limited experience has indicated very little interest in such books by either counselors or teachers. However, the professional library has been a valuable source of information to counseling students from graduate schools in the area, many of whom are doing their practicums in the school system or are working on theses or special projects. Too, the professional library has been a valued resource for information used by the center staff in developing career guidance programs throughout the school. Such programs include work with groups on different ability and interest levels; planning with teachers a series of class sessions on careers; planning in-service training experiences for counselors, librarians, and teachers in career development; and acquiring theoretical information when needed for individual guidance with students. It is hoped that school faculty will use this material more extensively as they become more familiar with what is available and as an increasing awareness of career development within the school creates a need.

Reference books include materials of general occupational and related information of use to counselors and students. Certain of these reference works are used repeatedly and should be included in every library, namely: The Dictionary of Occupational Titles, Occupational Outlook Handbook, The Encyclopedia of Careers, Lovejoy's Vocational Guide, Lovejoy's College Guide, National Directory of Schools and Vocations, The College Blue Book. See bibliography. Others in the bibliography have more limited, though valuable, use.

The largest section of books in the career library is composed of those categories intended primarily for student use. Most frequently circulated among students are the books giving occupational information about specific careers. In addition, the library has acquired books of general career information oriented around interests, industries, and some general career fields which are not easily classified. Examples of the above are outdoor occupations, occupations in specific industries, books about politics, biographies of inventors, and occupations for women.

A third category of books for students' career planning includes, for example, books about job hunting, career development, preparing a resume. At this writing, demand for these books has not been heavy; however, demand has been gradually increasing as students become familiar with the career center. The enthusiasm and appreciation expressed by students who have found information they had long been seeking about a career, or who have browsed and discovered new career ideas for exploration, have been most gratifying.

Pamphlets are used in numerous ways by students and may be borrowed from the library. Most students seem to prefer to read short paper pamphlets while in the center rather than to borrow them and be left with the responsibility of returning them. Free pamphlets are used extensively because of their accessibility. This use will be discussed later.

An additional resource of the library is an extensive supplementary file of pamphlets on social economic, and cultural information available to the school faculty for reference or research. This file has been used rather heavily by students of counseling and by members of the educational community who are doing research or special projects related to education and careers. Data in this collection include written material about technological changes, labor legislation, government programs, scholarships, dropouts, handicapped, among others. See the bibliography, Appendix A.

Audio-visual equipment in the career center is limited, although the staff is experimenting with ways in which these aids may be used efficiently. Using a portable sound filmstrip monitor equipped with ear phones has been initially the most effective means discovered to use audio-visual equipment with students. Since the monitor may be moved easily from place to place, it is possible to use it in student lounges, in study halls with thirty to forty students, or in small groups with counselors or teachers. It may also be used quietly with ear phones in the career center with one to four students. This medium is popular with both students and counselors, is automatically operated, and is flexible for use in varied settings. Sound filmstrips may also be used in large assemblies with regular projectors. The lack of sound filmstrip combinations on the subjects of careers and career development are a present limitation on their use by the center.

Quite a few tapes are now available which deal with on-the-job interviews with people in trades and vocations; they are particularly useful in guidance with technical or non-college-oriented students. Good tapes may often be transcribed or borrowed from educational centers such as Northeastern University's Career Information Center in Boston, Massachusetts; tapes are easily mailed and inexpensive to reproduce. Although the Newton center has not, in the first few months of operation, used tapes widely, the possibilities of use of this medium seem to be justified in light of the availability and relatively low cost of materials.

Films have not been purchased by the career center for several reasons. In the first place, high cost of films and projection equipment in relation to potential use in a high school does not seem justified for a career center. Experience at the center indicates that many more students may be reached effectively with more flexible and less expensive audio-visual media. The mechanics of setting up film projection equipment is time consuming and often awkward for guidance personnel who, more often than not, are working with small groups of limited interest in limited space. Often career assemblies do not have a wide enough appeal to justify a major school assembly. Unless the group is quite large, use of films seems impractical.

Another library service provided by the career center has been the development of extensive publishers' files and bibliographies of materials. Addresses of publishers of career materials are available by card file for individual use in the center. (See Appendix B) For example, if a counselor wishes to reorder certain pamphlets or free materials for a counseling group, he may find publishers' addresses on file in the center. The publishers' file and complete bibliography have also been stored electronically and are systematically updated and available for retrieval.

Mobile units containing classified occupational pamphlets have proved to be quite useful in working with students. Portable files, containing folders of materials classified and indexed according to the Dictionary of Occupational Titles, may be wheeled from the center to classrooms, libraries, counselors' offices or to student lounges. The career center staff have filled two of these mobile units with free materials so that students or faculty may look up any career of interest to them and find and take samples of free materials.

A library service which has been developed as a result of expressed student need is a collection of pertinent military and draft data and a collection of information about Peace Corps, Vista, and educational and occupational opportunities abroad. Many girls as well as boys have expressed interest in career opportunities in the armed forces; therefore, rather extensive data about careers for women in the services have been accumulated.

Providing a list of local community resources for career conferences, assemblies, and special programs is another service to the school which the center has established. Local universities, hospitals, professional groups, some church groups, industries, United Community Services, and liaison officers of the armed services will often provide entire programs for career assemblies or provide speakers for career conferences or individual interviews. After these sources have been screened by career center personnel, they are added to a community resource file in the center.

Guidance Services

When the career information library was integrated with the placement program to become the career guidance resource center in the high school, it became obvious that library services would be only one part of the total operation. Guidance services to students and faculty have become a major part of staff activities.

As a part of guidance services, the career center staff invited all of all kinds of occupations. Many students who were quite sophisticated and realistic about career plans requested specific educational and occupational information about particular careers. Other students' questions indicated a need for counseling. A list of such students' names was kept and a referral made to the appropriate counselor at a later conference.

Students used the sound filmstrip monitor in small groups with earphones and in larger groups with sound. In some lounges as many as one hundred students were able to watch career and career development filmstrips in a day. Very little use was made of tapes, probably because the monitor is more glamorous.

Teachers visited the career display by themselves and with their classes. Some teachers asked to bring classes to the lounge for a class period devoted to career exploration with the career consultant. Other teachers made appointments with the consultant to take career materials to the classroom at a later date. Both teachers and counselors collected free materials to be used with students. Activities in the student lounges proved to be excellent for orientation of the teaching faculty to the career information opportunities provided by the career center.

Consultation with students at the center is another guidance service provided by the professional staff. Often as a result of referral by school counselors, students come to the center to discuss such subjects as career interests, post high school educational options and training opportunities, local on-the-job training programs, career fields, and wide-range opportunities in specific industries. Students may also watch filmstrips and listen to tapes about career planning, job hunting, occupational trends and similar topics. Counselors, too, may come to the center to preview audio-visual materials or to consult with the staff.

Students may also watch filmstrips and listen to tapes about career planning, job hunting, occupational trends and similar topics. Counselors, too, may come to the center to preview audio-visual materials or to consult with the staff.

At the request of teachers, career center consultants have aided in planning classroom career activities. Plans for implementing these requests are always "custom designed" to meet particular needs of the class and desires of the teacher. Numbers of sessions range from one to six. Sometimes for English classes, free materials are provided to the class for exploration in combination with writing assignments about careers; occasionally sound filmstrips about career-related subjects are shown. The center staff is in the process of developing and evaluating with students some integrated series programs which could be used in classrooms and with small groups for four to six sessions. Potential for career guidance in cooperation with classroom teachers seems limitless if approached in the right way and should be a source of optimism from the point of view of counselors. In fact, teacher demand for career guidance has been a source of surprise and elation at the career center.

Another guidance service which the career center staff has found to be useful to students, and to the community as well, is to use local community resources to provide career assemblies and career conferences in the school. The staff has experimented with several kinds of these activities with different degrees of success.

When the staff began to investigate possible sources in the community of persons who would be available to come to the school to talk about careers, they were gratified to find that numerous institutions in the community were anxious to help, and some groups were organized for the purpose of supplying speakers and audio-visual materials for assemblies or conferences about their career fields. For instance, the need for workers in the health field is so great that one of the local hospitals has set up a Training Center for Comprehensive Care where people can be trained in many types of health careers.

This center will provide programs for large all-school assemblies on health careers at all levels from doctor to hospital aide. It will provide complete assembly programs or will send individual speakers to the schools for small career conferences or for individual interviews. Similar services are also provided by technological institutes, universities, United Community Services, church groups, and professional societies. In addition, such services as are typically provided by personnel offices in business and industry are also available. All services used by the center have been free of charge. Experience has shown that it is wise to screen free community programs for quality, effectiveness, and suitability in a high school situation before inviting them to the school.

After experimenting with both large assemblies and small career conferences, the staff believes that large assemblies are less efficient and less appropriate than career conferences planned on a smaller, less formal scale. Students seem to respond positively to informal discussions with young people who are involved in training programs or in early professional experience on the job.

In choosing topics to be discussed at career conferences and assemblies, the center staff picked career fields which seemed relevant to the student clientele and to the needs of the community. At each conference, occupational information concerning local training facilities, educational requirements, cost of training and other relevant information were given to students. Trends in the occupational field, working conditions, and potentials for eventual employment in the community were subjects for discussion. These career conferences served as sources of information for students, but were not primarily oriented to placement. Conferences with personnel representatives from business and industry for the purpose of placement could be incorporated as a separate career center function.

One large vocational guidance activity, of which the career center was co-sponsor with a student-counselor vocational committee, was a career day called, "Discovery '67". The stated purposes of the career day were (1) to display exhibits in the various occupational areas, (2) to encourage students to investigate vocational opportunities, (3) to distribute free materials about jobs, (4) to encourage students to discuss information obtained with teachers, counselors, and company personnel officers. Interested student representatives from each house council and from each high school curriculum made up the student committee of ten persons. Four members of the faculty and one staff member from the career center completed the faculty consulting committee. Planning was done jointly by student and faculty committees.

Preceding the career day, the committee offered to juniors and seniors a volunteer assembly program showing a film dealing with occupations in tomorrow's world. Teachers were asked to promote and to support the career program by calling it to the attention of their students and by carrying on brief discussions of career opportunities in the field of the teacher's discipline. A bulletin describing the purpose of the program was prepared and given to all teachers.

For the career day, exhibitors representing large employers, apprenticeship programs, and health services in the community were invited to come to the school to present an exhibit and to make a company representative available to talk to students. A letter was sent to employers by the student committee (Figure 1).

Fifteen exhibitors responded to the student invitation. Booths were set up in one large room where business and industry representatives were available to students all day. In a near-by room, films and filmstrips

NEWTONVILLE MASSACHUSETTS

Dear Mr. ____________:

The Student Committee on Occupational Information at Newton High School will sponsor an occupational exhibition on (date) entitled "Discovery '67." Our primary purpose is that of encouraging exploration of career opportunities - not placement or recruiting. Most of our students are interested in post-high school education, but unfortunately are not familiar with the various occupational fields. Our committee wants students to be aware of the many opportunities that are open to them.

We are inviting you to present an eye-catching exhibit that would encourage all types of students to examine the occupations available with your firm. We are also asking that a company representative be available to talk with students. Each exhibit booth will be approximately 10' x 10'. Our audio-visual department can assist you in setting up slide projectors, tape recorders, etc. Student volunteers will be in assistance during the exhibit hours from 8:40 A.M. - 3:30 P.M. Teachers will be invited to preview the exhibit from 7:45 A.M. - 8:20 A.M.

We hope that you will participate in our exhibition. If you wish additional information about our plans, please contact Mr. Samuel Grainger, guidance counselor, Newton High School (969-9810, Ext. 329) or myself.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

Student, Newton High School

about different careers were shown to interested students at announced times during the day. Attendance at the exhibition was good and seemed to fill a real need for many students. Some teachers brought their classes to the exhibition. Many students have requested that this program be repeated.

In evaluating the career day, the staff was inclined to feel that although it was an excellent experience for many students, the total amount of time and work involved in planning, promotion, and production were scarcely justified. Once a model is set up for this type of production, the mechanics become somewhat routine. However, the student and staff committees agreed not to repeat this activity the following year. It has been suggested that a simpler plan might be devised for future career days that would be less demanding of student and faculty time.

As another guidance service the career center provides a vocational testing service which is presently limited to the giving of a general interest survey. If counselors or students request such service, the center staff will administer the test or will provide tests for qualified counselors to administer themselves. This service is in addition to a basic, city-wide testing program for ability and achievement in the elementary and junior high schools.

Although very little has been done in the area of in-service training in career development for school faculty, the center ideally should perform this service. A beginning effort in this direction was made when the center presented some sound filmstrips on careers to the counseling staff at the monthly staff meeting and invited discussion on the values of the film presentations. In an effort to introduce career development theory to elementary teachers, center staff consultants met with head teachers at the regularly scheduled head teacher's meeting and presented a brief over-view of recent career development theory. This was followed by a question and answer period during which positive interest in this field was indicated. Believing that school librarians should be included in and made knowledgeable about the facilities of the career information library, the center staff invited the school librarians to come to the center to see the facility and to meet with counselors for a discussion of how counselors and librarians could work together. Again a positive response indicated a need had been met. It is hoped that these kinds of services to the school faculty may be developed into an effective in-service training plan.

Future plans for the center include many more guidance services, some of which are practical and easily implemented in many school systems and some of which are in the category of ideal goals toward which to work. Plans for the present career center are limited significantly by a lack of adequate space in an over-crowded school. Also, many possible guidance activities appropriate to the center would require additional staff and more money than seems reasonable for a high school budget. In this case, priorities must be established. Nevertheless, some ideas are worth considering.

One possibility which the center staff has been exploring with school counselors is more group guidance. Counselors have discovered that high school students, especially the juniors, are at a critical decision point. They need help in considering career choices in relation to their educational choices and, for those not attending college, in relation to impending placement choices. Although very little group counseling or guidance has been done previously in the school, counselors feel that with an information center available, meaningful small group guidance in career decision-making may now be possible and desirable. Plans for small groups are being made jointly between counselors and career center staff with the counselor taking primary and continuing responsibility for the group and the center consultant taking responsibility for supplying information and using informational materials with students.

Another goal for the center could be to provide programs for students and educators designed to widen vocational horizons - programs which would challenge the imagination occupationally. These might include travel slides showing occupations in other lands, speakers discussing student travel opportunities or summer job opportunities abroad, a discussion about volunteer opportunities locally and abroad, speakers explaining unusual occupations. Also, the center might act as a catalyst to promote extra-curricular projects related to occupations such as science fairs, field trips to industry or to training centers.

As a way of developing creative relationships to the world of work and widening areas of experience, a career center could promote student participation in community service projects. Support of national training opportunities such as the National Science Foundation summer projects would be a worth-while investment of staff time if this is not done adequately by other school departments.

Another possible guidance activity of the career center could be the promotion of "Prep Clubs" in the community. One design for club activities that has been successful in some communities has been for school personnel to seek people from business and industry who are willing to sponsor a vocational interest club related to the business. Club members, in conjunction with their community business leader, plan vocationally related programs according to their own design. Sometimes this means field trips, part-time jobs in the business or industry, speakers, or whatever the club desires. School responsibility for the "Prep Clubs" involves only the initial contacts to get them started and occasional consultation with leaders who may need guidance.

Information Dissemination Services

A major service provided by the career center is that of disseminating information. To be effective, occupational information must be made available to people who can make use of it. Few people seem to be sufficiently motivated or sufficiently aware of the availability of this type of material to seek it out for themselves. Consequently, the center staff has devised ways to get this information distributed.

The simplest device for dissemination is to use existing bulletin boards in the school. Career guidance posters are sent to student lounges, to counselors for their offices and to the libraries for career displays. The staff is also responsible for a large, centrally located bulletin board devoted exclusively to information from the guidance department. Here are placed posters advertising career conferences and assemblies, community career conferences, and other promotional materials. Here, too, are posted the latest draft regulations, relevant civil service exam schedules, career development posters, special notices, and Jobs for Youth bulletins.

A second major dissemination function has been the sending of copies of all free materials to the school library so that the library can be a second source of occupational information for students. In addition, the center has provided selected occupational reference books for the library. Originally, copies of all free materials were sent to individual counselors; this, however, proved impractical because of lack of storage facilities in counselor offices. Counselors may now get any free materials which they desire at the center.

Copies of selected occupational materials have been regularly sent to those department heads who wanted them. Typically, the head of the department distributes career materials to teachers for classroom use. Some teachers display in the classroom occupational information relevant to their subject; some use materials as teaching aids; some teachers use materials with individual students who seek specific career information. Occasionally the department will make a bulletin board display of occupational materials. Depending upon individual inclination, some teachers find these materials quite useful; others tend to be indifferent or wish not to be bothered with them. Use of occupational materials is left to the discretion of department heads and teachers.

Because the needs and programs of students at the technical high school are specialized, the center staff has worked out a special service with the technical high school counselor. Career materials which are specifically related to subjects taught in the technical high school are ordered in bulk and sent to the counselor who distributes them to teachers. The technical high subject teachers then work closely with students using career materials related to the subject.

Projected in future plans for the center is the issuing of career bulletins related to such subjects as job families, occupational trends, relation of subject matter to career development and local training opportunities. These bulletins could be mimeographed and sent to counselors; also, they could be made available in the center to all interested persons.

Community Liaison Services

A fourth type of service which a career resource center is equipped to provide is the community liaison service. It is helpful to both students and employers in the community for school personnel to develop a workable liaison with local employment centers. Traditionally, little has been done to promote cooperation among these public facilities in most communities. By making the effort to become familiar with the facilities and services at the local state employment center and by introducing employment center personnel to the school placement program, a relationship may be developed which will be mutually advantageous.

A second liaison service which the career resource center staff have begun to develop is the location and assessment of all types of educational institutions in the area. Some of these educational programs include technical training schools and institutes, on-the-job training programs, apprenticeships, business and other vocational schools, and retraining opportunities. To accomplish this task, one needs to seek the help of many civic organizations such as the Chamber of Commerce and the P.T.A.'s. Other sources of help are the newspapers and local unions.

If local business men could be recruited to sponsor its publication, a Vocational Resource Directory of the community could be produced from the collected material. This would be helpful to many organizations.- Practically speaking, producing a Vocational Resource Directory takes more time than most school personnel have. However, a career center staff member could spark the idea and possibly recruit people from the business community to do the job.

Because the career guidance resource center was developed as a model for adaptations for other schools, there has been considerable interest by other educators and counselors to see the center. Consequently, one community service which the staff has performed has been to welcome counselors from other communities to see the facilities and to explain the program. Professors teaching adult counseling courses in nearby universities have brought their classes to the center after school hours so that student counselors could see the center and talk to the staff about how such a program operates.

If the high school guidance staff does not have a strong college counseling service already established, the career resource center could act as liaison between the high school and colleges to plan meetings with college personnel and to provide a meeting place. The center might also provide a service for school drop-outs to help them get re-established either in the high school program or in a community training center.

Finally, if one can let imagination play freely, the resource center could possibly be used as a place for parents, in consultation with students and their counselors or center professional staff, to meet together for meaningful exploration of occupational opportunities. This would provide an adequate source of occupational and educational information for intelligent and realistic decision making.

Ways of Relating with Students, Faculty and Administration

The development of congenial, effective relationships with students, faculty and administrative personnel within the high school, when a new facility such as the career center is introduced, requires careful thought and planning. It is assumed that the approval and support of both the principal and the head of the guidance department have been ascertained before the career center is started. Adequate space and adequate starting and operating budgets should be agreed upon in advance. It would also be well to have at least theoretical support for such a facility from the counseling staff; preliminary understanding about anticipated relationships with the school library lessen the possibility of later misunderstandings.

As soon as the center becomes operational, certain administrative details must be worked out with, in this case, the assistant principal, the housemasters and the head of the guidance department. Some questions which had to be dealt with included the following: What pass system would be used for students wanting to get out of study hall or class to come to the center?

Who would sign the pass slips? Would students be allowed out of class to come to the center? Who would be responsible for proctoring assemblies and career conferences sponsored by the center? Would career assemblies be voluntary or required? These were questions to be worked out with the assistant principal.

When the center staff proposes activities in an individual house, such as the consultation and information program in student lounges, then permission and support of the housemaster must be obtained. This is usually done by arranging a meeting with the housemaster and the house counselors to explain purposes and activities and to secure support. Details such as arrangement of space for the display, use of house equipment, arrangements with study hall proctors and class teachers for release of students, hours when the lounge may be used - all have to be worked out with the housemaster.

It was understood prior to establishment in the high school that the center would be considered a section of the guidance department, and the professional consultant would be a member of the regular counseling staff under the supervision of the head of the guidance department. The relationship of the professional staff person to the head of the guidance department is thus similar to any other relation of counselor to department head. However, one difference which should be noted is that the center secretary is responsible to the professional staff member of the center. The department head has his own secretary; secretarial functions are totally separated. If it is possible to have two secretaries, it is felt that this separation of duties and responsibilities is essential.

One big question is to determine the working relationships between the center staff and the counseling staff in the school. This particular group of counselors, largely oriented to college counseling, had often expressed the need for more career guidance in the school system. Therefore, at Newton High School the idea of the center and of its potential activities was welcomed. On the other hand, the question of how to supplement counselor activities without duplicating or displacing their efforts had to be answered. As mentioned earlier, the counseling staff was invited to meet at the center to see what types of information were available and to find out how counselors might make use of the center. At this time, the policy of the center in relation to the counseling staff was agreed upon and suggestions for further activities were requested.

Although the career center was established as part of the guidance department, the staff felt that the needs of students could best be served by involving the teachers directly in the program of the center if possible. It was desirable that the teaching staff be aware that the career center was a guidance service, yet the staff wanted the entire faculty interest and support. It was also felt that a teacher willing to weave the fabric of career awareness into his teaching pattern would touch many students in ways not available to counselors. Therefore, after some consideration, the staff decided to adopt the same policy for working directly with teachers as with counselors: the career center would attempt to meet the expressed needs and desires of teachers. In case of conflict of time or interest, priority would be given to meeting counselor requests first.

Introducing the teaching staff to the center was complicated by the size of the teaching staff and the inability to get teachers together at one time. Therefore, it was decided to work individually with department heads, inviting them to see the center and to make use of its materials and staff in their department programs. Free materials relevant to the particular departments were sent to each department head from time to time. Occasionally requests for teacher evaluation of materials and a resumé of how materials were used were made.

Another way that contacts were made with teachers was through the projects in the student lounges. Counselors in the houses sponsoring the career center display sent mimeographed notes to teachers inviting them to visit the display and to bring their classes if they wished. Many teachers, after seeing what was offered, requested that the center consultant meet with their classes during regular class time. Thus began the various career programs within the classrooms. Subsequently, teacher requests have been made for center staff to talk about careers to home room groups during home room period. In addition, some teachers have requested that center personnel give interest inventories in the classroom, these to be followed by a series of class sessions in career development. Staff consultants have met with psychology classes to present career development theory as related to psychology and to talk about careers related to psychology. English teachers, using occupational information provided by the center, are now experimenting with ways to work career information into the curriculum. Members of the social studies department are presently discussing ways in which career information may be used in the social studies curriculum particularly for a group of students who are oriented neither to an academic nor to technical or commercial curricula.

In order to develop a congenial relationship, the center staff invited school librarians to see the career information library at its beginning. After explaining its purposes and functions as a guidance facility, the center staff and librarians discussed ways of implementing each others' services. Agreement was made that the career center would send copies of free occupational information to the libraries. Also, the center volunteered to provide some books and career kits to the library. The library helped the career center to set up its circulation plan and provided information to aid in the processing of books. When "Discovery '67" career day was held at the school, the career center and the school library together provided a display booth of career information. Occasionally the center sends career-related posters to the library for bulletin board displays. Sometimes the library features career books in library displays. Students seeking information in either facility may be referred to the other for additional help. This cooperative relationship has been a real asset to the career center and to the guidance program.

The question of how to develop good ways of relating with students is complicated because of the many variables of interest, schedules, attitudes toward working with adults and so forth. Students in this school were not inclined to respond to a typical advertising campaign or to announcements about the advent of a new career center in the school. Neither were they curious enough about occupational information to seek it out for themselves. Consequently, a first attempt to involve the students was through the work in the student lounges. In the houses, counselors recruited interested students from the house councils to help in publicity, poster making, lounge arrangements and liaison with center staff and the housemaster. Depending on degree of student motivation, this worked well in some houses and not as well in others.

In order to establish an on-going group of students related to career center activities, the staff, together with several high school counselors, developed a vocational consultation group comprised of students, counselors, and the center staff consultant. One purpose of the group was to familiarize the students with the materials at the center and with possibilities for vocational guidance activities. Another purpose was to get ideas for ways of interacting and to involve students as participators in program plans and activities. It was also hoped that this committee would help to explore ways of recruiting students as career center library aides and helpers.

In order to lay the groundwork for getting the committee organized, one of the school counselors spoke to the officers of the student councils of each house telling of the concern of their counselors about the need for students to show more interest in investigating the world of work. Having convinced the student leaders of the need for vocational exploration and planning, the students decided to form a vocational committee made up of two representatives from each house council, three school counselors and the center staff consultant. It was considered essential that each curriculum at the high school be represented on the committee to counteract the tendency for college-oriented students to assume leadership, leaving out commercial and career-oriented students who would be helped most by occupationally related programs.

Another way of relating to students has been in the one-to-one contacts at the center when students come for information or consultation or to use the audio-visual equipment. An atmosphere of informality, warmth and helpfulness with students has been consciously developed so that students enjoy coming to the center. When possible, they are encouraged to use the audio-visual equipment freely and independently and to explore vocational information in a relaxed fashion. The center consultants have endeavored to encourage students to follow up their explorations at the center with their counselors. Likewise, counselors have sent students to the center when information is needed. Free materials are available to students at all times at the center.

In the near future, as soon as the career information library circulation patterns have become routine and library rules established, student involvement as library aides and helpers is indicated and hoped for. Student volunteers will be recruited for these duties as they are for the high school library. It is also hoped that students eventually may be involved in making community contacts with business men for career conferences and similar activities at the school. The staff is exploring the possibility of working with students through some of their school clubs hoping that students will wish to sponsor career-oriented programs. For example, the school biology club might bring in a speaker on a subject such as oceanography. Other clubs could plan field trips to industry. Another could perhaps try role playing on "How to Apply for a Job". The possibilities are endless if and when enough student interest and motivation is created.

Evaluation of the Career Guidance Resource Center

One must admit that this model of a career guidance resource center has been developed under more ideal than typical conditions. Because of generous financial grants from sources outside the local school system, the optimum in materials and staff have been available. Therefore, schools contemplating a similar facility might want to investigate possible sources of financial help other than the school budget to get the information service started. Another possibility is to modify the types of materials collected. So much excellent occupational information is available free that one could provide a quite adequate information service with a few basic reference books and a collectio of free materials. A third possible adaptation might be the development of one large center similar to the one described here to serve a number of high schools in a city, with mobile satellite units available to individual schoo

Although the career resource center was established as part of the guidance department, it has been a goal of the staff to serve the whole school.

With a minimum of administrative control from the guidance department, the career resource center, while always giving priority to counselor desires, has developed a pattern of also working directly with students and teachers. Teachers may ask for assistance from resource center personnel without prior consultation with counselors. However, as a matter of courtesy, the staff consultant sends a weekly written report of planned activities to the head of the guidance department so that he may know what types of activities are being planned in all areas, and so that these plans may be discussed and modified if necessary. The staff has also made a policy of working in conjunction with counselors in house activities and in reporting student contacts to counselors so that counselors may be aware of student career interests. To facilitate this arrangement, the library check-out cards have a place for the student to write his counselor's name whenever he borrows a pamphlet. As a result, by looking at the borrower's cards, one can tell a counselor what career interests his various students have shown over a period of time. The above is a rather ideal arrangement. However, it has worked quite satisfactorily in this school situation and is recommended as a goal to work toward. The success of such an arrangement depends, of course, on satisfactory prior understandings and on the cooperation of the guidance department head.

Something should be said here about the evaluation of occupational information materials used in the center. Because this center was developed as a model, at first materials were bought without prior evaluation so that center personnel could see what types and amounts of materials were available. The library accumulated occupational materials on all educational levels and in all media. The first effort at evaluation was to divide the materials into different reading and interest levels. Since the center was to operate in the high school, all materials appropriate to elementary or junior high levels were sent to elementary and junior high libraries, leaving high school level occupational information in the career resource center. After the division of materials by levels was made, further evaluation was begun on a pragmatic basis using the "Guidelines for Preparing and Evaluating Occupational Materials," National Vocational Guidance Association, 1964, as a general guide.

Perhaps here "pragmatic evaluation" should be explained more completely. When the center staff first began to work with students, they observed that certain careers and career fields were consistently in demand in this particular school. Consequently, it made sense to order additional information in demand areas. Also, certain publications, for example in the field of law, were much more comprehensive, more attractive to students, and more generally adequate according to the "Guidelines" than were others. The best of these were re-ordered in quantity.

Another pragmatic criteria for re-ordering was appropriateness of the materials for this general area. In Massachusetts there is very little demand for careers in cattle ranching. Therefore, although at least one example of each career description was kept on file, reorders were not made for inappropriate materials.

The budget is another reason for evaluation of materials. When money must be considered, one soon learns that much of the free material available is as well done as that in expensive commercial career kits and subscription services. Decisions must be made between paperback or cloth books, between books and pamphlets, between audio-visual materials and written information. Because career materials are so soon outdated, different criteria from the usual library criteria of evaluation must be used. It must also be said that some materials available are not worth keeping at all. Some are slanted for use at the high school level although the staff is ready to explore with English teachers the use of career-related biographies in English classes. Librarians at the junior high have noted that junior high students enjoy career biographies.

As stated previously, the career center staff have found motion pictures expensive and usually awkward to use for career groups. Tapes have a useful potential with interest in them indicated especially by counselors from the technical school. At this writing, very little has been done with the occupational interview tapes. Sound filmstrips have been used widely and seem particularly popular with students.

A word might be said about the purposes of the career resource center as they relate to the evaluation and accumulation of materials. The goal has been to create a career service for students, counselors and other faculty which is as useful and comprehensive as possible. Consequently, different levels and types of information have been collected from broad career-field information meant to prod the imaginations of exploring students to specific, local training opportunities and job placement information for those ready to enter an occupation. For the adult professional clientele, professional books in career guidance as well as social, cultural, educational, and career development literature have been collected. College and career reference materials are available for both students and faculty as are free career-related materials and audio-visual equipment.

Observation of student levels of sophistication in regard to career development indicates that in this high school the students are on a continuum of career development from the naive level of little awareness of themselves as related to occupation (the explorers) to the sophisticated level of highly motivated specific research about a chosen field or career. Students use at the high school level although the staff is ready to explore with English teachers the use of career-related biographies in English classes. Librarians at the junior high have noted that junior high students enjoy career biographies.

Observation of student levels of sophistication in regard to career development indicates that in this high school the students are on a continuum of career development from the naive level of relative awareness of themselves as related to occupation (the explorers) to the sophisticated level of highly motivated specific research about a chosen field or career. Students that one talks to seem generally unaware of different job levels in the field of industries as a whole, and of the realities and variety of opportunities in the community and elsewhere. Consequently, the career resource center has felt it desirable to collect information ranging from the very general and even imaginative to the specific and immediately practical levels. As a guide line for other schools, it is suggested that the choice of kinds and levels of materials to be stored should be made in terms of the need of the particular clientele, within the limits of available funds.

What of the Future?

With all of the library, placement, guidance, dissemination, and liaison services that the career resource center has tried, there are other goals to which a center such as this may aspire. Some of these are admittedly idealistic, and in many cases impractical at the present time for most school systems. Yet it is important to be aware of other possibilities - occasionally to aim for the improbable. What are some future goals for a career resource center?

First, let us suggest that this center could be a storehouse for adequate recording, transcribing, and viewing devices for counselor use, the central place in the school where counselors could come to use equipment and thus to make the most efficient use of both counselor time and expensive equipment. Or to look ahead one step further, the center might contain a computer console programmed for interactions with students in conjunction with career guidance and the counseling process. Such a computer will be field tested in the career resource center in 1969 as part of the Information System for Vocational Decisions (ISVD). This is a joint research project supported by the U. S. Office of Education through the cooperative efforts of the Harvard Graduate School of Education, New England Education Data Systems (NEEDS) and the Newtôn Public School System. This will allow the center to provide an electronic storage and retrieval service for social, educational and occupational information.

The center, too, might collect entering class profiles published by colleges to aid counselors in helping students with realistic educational decision-making. In addition, the center might store school follow-up information so that students could use follow-up data from former students' records to help in career and educational decisions. The career resource center staff have already begun to organize follow-up data in such a way that it can be used meaningfully with students. If the center had the necessary space, it could provide an informal meeting place for counselor-faculty forums, student interviews with former students, or perhaps in-service training sessions for members of the faculty.

Possibilities for such a center seem broad enough to make some adaptation of the career guidance resource center model a worthwhile project for almost any school system. A flexible adaptation could be made at almost any level in whatever type of school.

Appendix A Bibliography of Occupational Material for Career Planning

The bibliography of career planning materials which follows is an edited listing of materials assembled by the Career Information Project over the past three years. The bibliography is divided into nine major sections:

(1) Specific occupational materials (organized according to the 1965 Dictionary of Occupational Titles classification coding); p. A-6.

(2) General occupational materials describing career fields not classifiable in regular two-or three-digit D.O.T. groupings; p. A-172.

(3) Professional books of direct or peripheral relevance to career planning; p. A-175.

(4) Reference books and directories; p. A-181.

(5) Supplementary occupational and educational information of a supportive nature -- materials of career relevance, but not pertaining to one specific occupation or group of occupations (organized according to a modified version of the filing plan found in Max F. Baer & Edward C. Roeber, Occupational Information, Chicago, Ill.: Science Research Associates, Inc., 1964, pp. 470-474); p. A-184.

(6) Student occupational workbooks; p. A-214.

(7) Career planning books for student use; p. A-215.

(8) College and general educational information related to career planning; p. A-216.

(9) General career information about career fields, industries, and unclassified occupations such as politics and invention; p. A-216.

Each document entry in the bibliography contains the following information: classification coding, author, title, publisher, year of publication, number of pages, and price. Obviously, this bibliography is not exhaustive of all the materials available at present in the United States. The authors believe, however, that this bibliography is representative and may have a higher utility value than any other existing source because of its classification system.

The coding system and abbreviations used are mostly self-explanatory. Materials designated with an "E" or "J" level are those considered by the authors to be appropriate for use at the elementary and junior high school levels respectively. The remaining undesignated materials are most appropriate for high school and adult usage. Free materials are so designated. The symbol "UNPR" in the price area refers to "unpriced" materials, those materials which had no cost figure printed on them. Staff limitations prevented our searching for correct prices for all these materials. The writers suggest that the user refer to the appropriate publisher's catalogue for most recent prices on these materials. Please do not confuse the "UNPR" with the "FREE" designation. Materials marked "UNPR" may be either free or available for purchase. The reader should also be aware that the prices used in the bibliography were accurate at the time they were compiled, but that prices vary over a period of time.

The number of pages of each document has been entered where possible. "FLDR" in this area refers to unpaged folders. Where no author was listed on a document, the publisher's name was used for bibliographic listing. Complete publisher addresses may be found in Appendix B.

The Specific Occupational Materials Bibliography (D.O.T. Coded): Basis of the Classification Arrangement

This first section of the total bibliography is the most important section, and is intended for use with the 1965 Dictionary of Occupational Titles (third revision). The titles and codes used as divisions within this bibliography provide a flexible structure within which most occupational materials can be located. Because the D.O.T. classification plan is probably more comprehensive and widely used than any other scheme, the authors believe this bibliographic arrangement is a substantial contribution to the field of vocational guidance.

Volume I of the Dictionary of Occupational Titles, known as "Definitions of Titles," serves as an alphabetical cross reference index to this bibliography. It also provides individual job definitions for many thousands of jobs. (The Dictionary of Occupational Titles, third edition, 1965, is available from the Superintendent of Documents, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C. 20402; Vol. I: $5.00, Vol. II: $4.25, Supplement: $2.75).

The user of this bibliography should possess a working knowledge of the D.O.T. Self-instruction in the use of the D.O.T. may be obtained through use of a programmed textbook, known as the Training Manual for the Dictionary of Occupational Titles (Third Edition). (Available from the Superintendent of Documents: Employment Office Training Program, Unit 4 (revised); Part A, Instructor's Guide, $.25; Part B, Trainee's Workbook, $1.75).

Explanation of the Numerical Classification

This bibliography is arranged by code numbers. The occupations are arranged by categories, divisions, and groups. The bibliography has nine major occupational categories, each designated by different one-digit code numbers.

The major occupational categories with their code numbers are:

1 } Professional, technical, and managerial occupations

2 Clerical and sales occupations

3 Service occupations

4 Farming, fishery, forestry, and related occupations

5 Processing occupations

6 Machine trades occupations

7 Bench work occupations

8 Structural work occupations

9 Miscellaneous occupations

These nine occupational categories are divided into eighty-four main two-digit divisions which, in turn, are subdivided into 603 distinctive three-digit groups.

Example:

2 Clerical and sales occupations (category)

21 Computing and account recording occupations (division)

216 Computing-machine operators (group)

A complete explanation of the classification system and its use may be found in the D.O.T.

Thus the bibliography consists of a simple, logical method of arranging occupational material references according to major categories of work, the main divisions of work within the broad category, and the specific occupational groups within divisions.

Finding the Desired References

Counselors using the following bibliography to find references on any particular occupation should use the D.O.T. as a primary source. Volume I of the D.O.T. is intended for use as any dictionary. Under each job title, along with a concise job definition, is the job classification number. The number may then be used in locating additional occupational materials listed in the following bibliography. For example, COUNSELOR is given a code number of 045.108 in Volume I of the D.O.T. References to printed occupational information pertaining to the work of the COUNSELOR are grouped under 045.108 in the bibliography.

Problems in Assigning Classification Codes

Frequently occupational information documents contain information regarding more than one occupation or group of occupations. Thus, assigning a single D.O.T. number to that document may overlook several other possible classifications. Ideally, a document of that nature should be assigned multiple codings. Circumstances within the project reported herein dictated that only a single classification number be assigned to each document. The coders, therefore, attempted to assign the coding of the major occupation referred to in the document. If a document clearly described an occupational category or division, one-digit or two-digit code numbers were assigned, instead of the three-digit codes usually assigned to specific occupations. Thus, in the following bibliography, all documents with one- or two-digit D.O.T. codes usually describe an occupational cluster or group. The reader should be aware that no classification scheme is perfect. Recognizing the limits inherent in the D.O.T. schema, the reader should be able to utilize the following bibliography to advantage.
